College dragged out to the year's end. Ruth persistently declared she was not coming back.

"Dad and mother will be disappointed," she told Dot. "They have scraped and saved for years so I might go to college. But the college they remember was different—all plain living and high thinking. I want a little froth in my life, too. Isn't it funny? In Millersville I thought a hundred dollars a year would be an ample clothes allowance! But after I got a coat and this blue serge suit and a ready-made blue silk there was nothing left."

Dot heard little from her that Summer. A mysterious card came in June bearing the word "Eureka!" Then one in August, "Meet me at the train in September," which Dot did eagerly one crisp Fall morning.

"Where is Ruth?" she was wondering as passengers filed off the train, not recognizing a smart, slender figure in a blue traveling dress whose tailored touches and good lines simply cried "Style!" Then Ruth hugged her.

"You dear, to come back!" cried Dot. "Why how stunning you look—and how happy!" Yes, Ruth was more than pretty, she was beautiful now! Some miracle had touched her.

Alex rushed up to her just then. "So glad to see you," he cried. He had been in the West all summer.

"How dar-er-dandy you look," he rushed on, a little confused. There was a little confident air about Ruth now that held him off! But it certainly was fascinating!

"Our frat gives a little reception tomorrow night," he hesitated. "May I come for you?" And Ruth smiled acceptance.

After lunch two trunks came for Ruth, much to Dot's amazement. Last year one small one had sufficed.

"I'm dying to know what's in them," Dot said. "May I see? I scent a surprise—you seem so mysterious!"

At once Ruth unlocked one. Then she drew from its tissue paper wrappings a miracle of a visiting costume, soft chiffon velvet, a lovely taupe color, Frenchly set off by a tiny vest of gold and pink brocade. With this went a taupe georgette blouse, beaded in gold, pink and old blue.

"Where in the world did you get that beautiful costume?" Dot was wide-eyed now. "It's too lovely to wear, almost!"

Ruth smiled, then lifted out an evening dress, crimson silk covered with petal-like tiers of tulle, ranging from rose to flame color, shoulder-strapped with tiny hand-made satin roses.

"Ruthie Allison, you don't mean that dream of a gown is yours? Haven't you gotten Miss Vanderbilt's trunk by mistake?"

Not answering, Ruth took out another party dress, with panniers and quaint peasant bodice. "Corn color! The color I always said you should wear!" exclaimed Dot.

"Here is my favorite," smiled Ruth calmly, displaying a dainty creation of cream-colored satin and silver lace. Dot gasped again. "Pinch me—am I still on earth?" she whispered. "Three party frocks! Surely there can be nothing more!"

But there was—a blue silk "for Sundays," exquisitely braided and faintly touched with scarlet; an intricately draped printed voile, all misty grays and lavenders with a violet girdle; a smart brown serge sailor suit and an even smarter checked woolen frock with clever flare pockets and tiny leather belt. Dot, lying on the couch in pretended exhaustion, sat up.

"Has a long-lost uncle returned from Klondike? Or did your father strike oil in the backyard?"

Still the mysterious, mischievous smile, as Ruth took out a crisp linen and a demure sashed gingham.

"Just one more, except for shirtwaists and such."

"One more" proved a wonderful evening coat, aero blue with white marabou collar. Then Ruth sat down and faced her friend.

"No, I didn't rob a bank or find a pot of gold," she began. "And I didn't exceed my clothes allowance of $100." Dot turned frightened eyes on her—something had surely affected Ruth's brain!

"Honestly! I'll prove it by this expense account. Taupe velvet, brocade and georgette, $28 (I plunged on that costume). Tulle for party gown $6.50. The foundation (don't laugh!) was an old red silk cover for our square piano, laid away and forgotten."

"The evening coat was mother's long-ago party cape, aided by a few yards of marabou. The corn-color silk was an old dress of hers. And do you recognize the braided taffeta?"

"Not your last year's best dress!"

Ruth nodded. "The other party dress contains three and a half yards of crepe satin and three of silver lace, at a total cost of $21.70."

"Don't dare analyze that compound of moonlight and mystery!" commanded Dot.

"The serge traveling dress was my last year's suit, the checked wool a made-over, too."

"But who made them? Has a Fifth Avenue modiste adopted you?"

"Why, I did!" came the astounding reply.

"You!" was all Dot could utter.

"Yes. You see, Aunt Susanna told me her secret. She learned to sew wonderfully right at home, and she insisted that I could, too. And I did! Why, after only four lessons I made some dear 'undies,' two waists and this crepe kimona! Then I made over that checked wool horror Miss Simms, the Millersville dressmaker, had evolved. Don't you like it?"

"It's wonderful! But tell me, how did you learn all this at home. Who taught you? I'm breathless to know!"

"Why, the Woman's Institute, of course. I was soon able to make really elaborate things, so I took a trip to the city and copied some models from a fashionable shop. Dad and mother were wild with delight. They had guessed my unhappiness. Soon I made some darling clothes for several kiddies at home and earned enough for slippers and boots. During Christmas vacation I've promised to help on a bridal trousseau—and thereby earn my Spring suit!"

"Do you think I could learn to sew, too?" Dot's voice was unsteady now and Ruth knew that underneath her friend's saucy manner all the while had been the hurt a normal girl feels when wearing shabby clothes.

"Learn!" exclaimed Ruth. "Why, you couldn't help learning! The text books seem to foresee and answer every possible question. The pictures are simply marvelous and the teachers take just as personal an interest in your work as they do here in the college classrooms!"

"It isn't necessary to know anything at all about sewing—the instruction is so complete! And the course can easily be completed in a few months by studying an hour or two a day. You see it makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you wish, and just whenever it is convenient."

"I know that the Woman's Institute has really made me more capable than most professional dressmakers—after just these few months of study at home!"

"Well, you won't be able to keep Alex away now," said Dot meaningly. Ruth's eyes grew dreamy. She saw herself in the moonlight-and-mystery gown, queening it among his frat friends, while he watched her jealously, or in the velvet one on the way to a sorority tea, dainty, aristocratic, every inch a lady of his own world. She saw herself in the rose-and-flame dress which turned her into a vivid, glowing gypsy, transformed her lips to scarlet petals and eyes to deep dark pools of allurements, listening to an ardent question. And she knew her dream was really a prophecy!

For a sequel to Ruth's story peep into a sorority house the following Spring.

There are Ruth and Dorothy in a group of girls. They had "joined" in the Fall.

"And it should have been a year earlier!" exclaimed one girl. But we never would have known what darlings you two are had we not been attracted first by your delightful clothes! Clothes really are a sign-post to one's character. What are you going to do this Summer, Ruth?"

"I won't tell," she laughed. "But just you girls bring back all the feathers and scraps of velvet you can!"

"I know," said one wise maiden, "the Woman's Institute teaches millinery, too. Going to make us some bridesmaids' hats, Ruthie?" And Ruth's blush was no denial.

What happened to Ruth can happen to you. More than 85,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can quickly learn at home, in spare time, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes and hats or prepare for success in dressmaking or millinery as a business.

It costs you nothing to find out what the Institute can do for you. Just send a letter, post-card or the convenient coupon below and you will receive—without obligation by return mail—the full story of this great school that has brought the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business, to women and girls all over the world.

would still cost more than Quaker Oats

Quaker Oats costs one cent per large dish. It costs 12 times that to serve one chop, and 8 times that to serve a piece of fish.

Quaker Oats costs 6½ cents per 1,000 calories—the energy measure of food value. Any meat dish costs from 7 to 12 times that. Steak would need to sell at 5 cents a pound to be as cheap as oats.

Yet the oat is the greatest food that grows. It is almost the ideal food in balance and nutrition. The young and old should eat it at least once a day. And Quaker Oats makes it delicious.

The Wind Wheel of the Djinn

The Finger of Ananda

By BERTHA E. GREEN

THOSE things that we call days and months and years went by unheeded. To Acwol, the Djinn, time counted for nothing. He had called, and as he now sat on the mountain top, his hand upon the great wheel, a breath stirred the clouds to the Southward, and through them a wind burst in a homing rush to its master. The wind swept toward the Djinn, whose calm eyes warmed as he noticed the traveller's eagerness. He knew that this home-coming wind bore to him a story which it was glad to tell.

On the great wheel of the winds, he wound it, fold on fold, Pictured upon the wind were mirrored scenes brought from a far-off land.

It was mid-summer in Burmah, and the Monsoon blew steadily, evenly, from the south. Clear days and clear suns began each morning, and the first to greet them was the pagoda of Ananda with its seven roofs of rich red-brown. Miles beyond Mandalay, the great city, it reared its spire; one of Ananda, they played their games, while Mee Poo watched them, his mind full of honey-cakes.

All the time the wind was blowing, and here amongst the ruins the wind played too. Across the open spaces it swept the dust, curling it into spinning cones,—“the dancing ones,” the children called them. It was a mad wind, and full of pranks, and as they watched, Nyo exclaimed:

“It is a dance! It is the wind dancing! Never have I seen it so full of fun before.”

As he spoke, a swirling crowd of the dust-dancers swept past them, and Nyo and Sepaya followed, hand in hand, dancing and singing as they went. In and out between piles of stone and broken pillars danced the children; and as they came by what had once been a large gate, the wind swept up a scrap of tinselled gilt and kept it whirling, dancing, flashing, in the sunlight.

It was only a scrap of make-believe gold, a little piece of gilt paper, but came to it along an avenue of toddy-palms, and there were elephants in its courtyard.

The roadway to the pagoda was red as tan-bark, and, above the two children who walked upon it, the palms waved fronded heads of green. And this road was always a wonderland to Nyo and his sister Sepaya, for was not this the road to the elephants? The freedom of a holiday had brought them again upon their favorite way, and they soon reached the great courtyard, and found there a friend, Mee Poo, who had two tusks, a trunk, two floppy ears, and a great kindness for the children.

To Mee Poo the children brought a large, flat cake, sweet with honey, and in return, he lifted them high behind his large head, and they rode 'round the courtyard, and even the most solemn priest of the pagoda smiled on them.

They rested at the feet of Mee Poo in the shadow of the great wall, and there from the keeper of the elephants, they heard of a lost treasure.

THE temple had lost the most precious of its jewels, the great ruby, the Heart of Ananda, had disappeared. None knew where it had gone. Day had followed day in fruitless search, and the priests of the temple were in despair.

It was a great loss, the children thought, soberly, but, being children, they soon forgot it in the delights of rambling beyond the courtyard. Amongst the ruins of a temple older than that the children laughed and followed it as it fluttered ahead of them, like a butterfly.

Little Sepaya watched it eagerly.

“It is coming down there—there—there—down— It has it in the hollow beneath that great round stone.”

Nyo reached the make-believe butterfly first, and as he bent down to pick it up, the wind moved it slightly, and underneath the edge of the stone came a gleam of amber light. There lay a great topaz, a glowing, sparkling, yellow gem half buried in the dust. The children knew it at once, and Nyo's eager fingers picked it up and held it to the sunlight, while he and little Sepaya gazed in wonder.

“It is a lost jewel from the temple,” said Nyo to his sister, “a Nat has taken it and hidden it here. We will take it back to the priests. Then they will give us money for finding it, and—”

“And we can buy more honey-cakes for Mee Poo,” said Sepaya.

So Nyo put the great topaz safely in a fold of his clothing, and the children turned to go back to the pagoda. But all this time the wind was blowing, and dipping down beneath the stone, it caught up the scrap of gilt paper again and swept it fluttering in front of the children.

“It is flying again,” cried little Sepaya, “Let us follow it.”

FLASHING in front of them, the bit of tinsel was carried on the wind, the children following eagerly.

Between tall pillars it led their feet, on and up a few wide ruined steps of

AMONG the business transacted at the eighth annual convention of the New Brunswick Women's Institutes held in Moncton recently was the formation of a provincial advisory board with the officers as named below.

Eighth Annual Convention of New Brunswick Institutes

By ELIZABETH BAILEY PRICE

Miss McCain's Report.

The meeting opened with the singing of the ode "O Canada," followed by an address of welcome by His Worship Mayor Chapman, of Moncton, who assured the delegation of their hearty welcome to the city and pledged the co-operation of the city in making their convention a success, and he hoped that this might not be the last time that the Women's Institutes would confer the honor on Moncton as their place of meeting.

Mrs. R. W. L. Earle, President of the Perth Institute, replied, voicing the warm appreciation of Mayor Chapman's cordial welcome and also their grateful acknowledgment of what the opening of their busy city to the convention meant to the people of Moncton.

The work throughout the land accomplished by the Women's Institutes materially influenced the lives of women both in the rural and urban districts more than any other organization in Canada.

Miss McCain then read her report as supervisor of work accomplished since last convention, first welcoming the fellow Institute workers and visitors to this their eighth annual gathering, and hoped that each member would feel that the convention was hers and in extent to her own personal effort in its behalf would be its success. Six new Institutes had been organized since last convention and several places in Kings, Carleton, St. John and Northumberland were making enquiries and showing interest which argued well for others following.

Receipts from July, 1919, to July, 1920, from 79 Institutes, $18,281.73, expenditures, $11,293.78. Considerable increase over receipts of last year. One financial appeal had been made to them from the Department for the Salvation Army campaign fund, which they had generously responded to and for which they had received the heartfelt appreciation of Brigadier Moor, in charge of this campaign, in helping to put this work well over the top.

Miss McCain noted that the Institutes have considerable status throughout the land as in the furthering of any campaign they were among the first organizations called up to contribute their support.

Short Courses Held.

Short courses had been held in Sussex, Chatham, Bathurst, Devon, Perth and St. Stephen during the winter months. Subjects taken up were cookery, millinery and nursing, the instructors being Miss Nutter, Miss Love and Miss Landry, all competent in their respective lines of work. Miss LeBlanc, at the time these courses were on, was visiting the French districts giving demonstrations of milk, its food value and practical uses.

At the conclusion of the English courses the same were put on in Buctouche, Tracadie, Kedgwick and St. Leonards by Miss LeBlanc and Miss Landry, who have command of both the French and English languages so necessary to these parts of the province. Following this Miss Landry, R. N., was secured for child welfare work throughout the western section of the province while at the same time Miss Nutter instructed on the food value of vegetables in the eastern section.

Miss McCain touched briefly on the Dominion convention which met in Toronto in November. All the provinces were represented except P.E.I. which has since come in. She read the greetings from Queen Mary brought to that convention by Mrs. Alfred Watt, the representative from England and Wales. Her Majesty is president of the Women's Institute of Sandringham and takes a keen interest in everything pertaining to the work.

An alliance was formed between Canadian and British Institutes of which Judge Murphy would tell in her address. Miss McCain spoke of the broadening influence of the work and urged the women of New Brunswick to realize that a glorious opportunity presents itself as never before, and to rise to the high ideal set before them.

Resolutions Adopted Unanimously.

Resolutions to the following effects were unanimously adopted:

Resolution memorializing the Dominion Government to place referendum on the liquor question before the people at the earliest date possible.

Resolution asking that steps be taken to prohibit children unaccompanied by parents or guardians from roaming the streets at night.

Resolution recommending to the various Institutes the suggestion given by Miss Hayhurst re the sending of the names of blind or near blind in their respective localities to the branch of the National Institution for the Blind at Halifax.

Reports of Institutes.

Reports from a number of Institutes were most encouraging and a few are as follows:

Kennebecasis Valley reports two members. They furnished a room for the Protestant Orphans' Home, St. John, made two quilts, garments for needy family.

AN EASTERN OFFICER

Miss Della E. Saunders, of Charlottetown, is the superintendent of the Women's Institutes, Prince Edward Island.

Newtown and Smith's Creek reports 21 members and $100.50 raised. Much community work was done and a contribution given to the Salvation Army drive.

Penobscis, 25 members, school work taken up and school house cleaned. Receipts $116.74. Contributed to Salvation Army drive, $10.00.

Sussex reports 45 members, an increase of 20 over last year. Receipts $300, mostly from proceeds of Hallowe'en fair. Equipment was provided and hot school lunches started in the schools, but these had to be discontinued owing to the older girls being unwilling to wash the dishes. Many needy families were helped at Christmas and Christmas boxes were provided for 80 children. Sewing had been done for families needing help and nurses provided during the influenza for needy families.

Lower Millstream: $64.30 raised; gave to Protestant Orphans' Home, St. John, $25.00, Salvation Army drive, $5.00. They have a circulating library and had purchased $15.00 worth of books.

Mount Carmel, 70 members, reported social meetings and the making of a quilt.

Whitneyville, 30 members. Receipts, $132.00. They reported much social activity. Each one of their returned men they had presented with a tie pin, and to the nursing sister, a fountain pen; $15.00 had been given to the Provincial Home. $10.00 to the Salvation Army drive. Prizes had been given by them to the school children for good attendance.

Lower Jemseg—30 members. Receipts, $355.79. Assistance had been given to a family burned out, clothing sent and made for them and $318 collected for their new home.

Fredericton Junction—32 members; $67.00 had been collected for the Salvation Army drive. Good work had been done in the schools, a committee of two visiting same each month. A flag had also been presented to them. Dishes had been bought, quilts made, and their Agricultural Society entertained. They now had $117.82 towards the furnishing of the kitchen in the new agricultural hall being built.

Hoyt Station—Receipts $158.84. Reported good work along various lines. A free supper had been given to the boys and girls of the pig and poultry clubs of their community.

Andover, the oldest Institute in New Brunswick, reported 40 members, 12 new this year. A gold medal had been given in their grammar school for highest marks and deportment; this in memory of their first honorary president, Mr. Baxter. They had now $225.00 towards the erection of a fire alarm; $389.33 receipts for the year.

South Tilley—24 members; receipts $252.29; were saving for a community hall; visited the schools once a month and gave every assistance to the teacher. A drinking fountain and a stove had been provided for their school, and they of their own account, had supplied medical inspection for their school. They also have a good circulating library.

Petitcodiac—52 members; $664.77 receipts for the year. This money was mostly raised toward a memorial hall. Armistice Day, a banquet had been given their returned men; they had also held basket suppers and an Easter sale, and had purchased dishes and table linen and cup towels. Altogether it had been a most satisfactory year.

Fine Speeches.

Many good speakers contributed to the programme, among them being Judge Emily Murphy, otherwise known as "Janey Canuck," President of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada.

To hear such women as Judge Murphy speak is both an inspiration and an education. The speaker told of her long anticipated wish to visit the Maritime Provinces, and now that she was actually here, she felt somewhat as the old lady in the nursery rhyme must have felt—"This is surely none of I." Her trip had been a delight, especially through the Matapedia Valley, so beautiful in its autumn garb.

Coming to the real subject for the evening, that of work done in the juvenile and women's courts, of which she herself is the head, Judge Murphy briefly explained how she first took up that work. She had always been interested in law and five years ago had been appointed police magistrate of the city of Edmonton. She has the honor of being the first woman magistrate in the British Empire.

For some time she had been convener of laws for the Women's Council, and one time became much interested in some women who had been arrested in the city. She decided to send two women from the local council to the court house to see what was being done for them, but on their going down they were denied admittance on the plea that the evidence was not fit for a mixed audience.

That was all she needed. She accepted the ruling of the court and then made it a plea to the Attorney-General for a court for women.

This plea was granted and she was offered the position of stipendiary magistrate of this court, which she accepted.

Judge Murphy said there were many phases of work she would like to bring before them, one of the problems, that of the country girl who comes to the town to get a place. They were trying to teach the people to look after their own girls, not to leave them until seeing exactly how they were placed, for often these girls are led off in other directions.

Then the housing conditions, especially in the rural districts, being often too crowded for the existence of the best sanitary and moral conditions. The Women's Institutes are doing great work in this line.

There were also the many sad cases of insanity that she meets with in her work, especially in the war period. The foreigners, not hearing from home, all under suspicion, the strain they were

Through the Looking Glass by VAIN JANE

OCCASIONALLY a letter received from one of the junior readers of this department brings to light the fact that the first principles of beauty culture are somewhat vague in their minds and that they are groping along, somewhat blindly, without the knowledge that is essential if the best results are to be obtained. In the matter of the skin, for instance, and particularly the skin of the face, it is necessary to know, before we begin any method of treatment for its improvement, just the material we are working on. The skin, be it therefore understood, is a covering which lies upon the layer of fat which covers the muscles of the face; it is this fat which gives the face its contour, and when it is lacking, the face falls into hollows and the skin naturally becomes wrinkled and relaxed. As has been pointed out by a well-known authority on the subject, while the skin is more or less elastic, it has not the power to overcome entirely the loss or falling in of weakened muscles or loss of fat, and eventually loses its own vitality for want of proper blood supply and takes on a dry, shrivelled appearance. On the other hand, such fault may be in the skin itself, while the muscles are comparatively well formed; it may harbor infectious germs as a result of improper cleansing, causing eruptions or skin disease, or it may have been subjected to other irritants like sunburn, causing discoloration or reddening and chapping or scaling. Similar results follow the use of impure, rancid or irritating soaps, a very common cause of skin trouble.

The skin, it may be pointed out, has two layers, an outer or scarf skin for protection, and a true skin underneath. The outer skin has no blood vessels, but the true skin contains these and nerves, and the sweat and sebaceous glands. It is the blood vessels which supply the color to the face and the sweat sebaceous glands which carry off the superfluous water and oil from the skin. It will be seen that any interference or clogging of these glands would be destructive to the skin, affecting its color, texture and health.

Because the skin of the face is so constantly exposed to the dust of the air, it is most necessary to care for its cleanliness. No foreign matter must be allowed to stop the pores and interfere with the function of the skin. However, as we have pointed out many times before, the greatest care must be taken in cleansing the skin of the face and the use of irritating or impure soaps or chemicals of a harmful nature, is quite disastrous to the natural beauty of a healthy skin.

It seems an exaggerated thing to say, but very few people know how to wash their faces properly. And as it is a function we perform at least (and I hope more often) three hundred and sixty-five times in the year, it is just as well to be carrying it out in a prescribed manner. The use of soap in washing is a disputed point; however, it is my opinion that unless the skin is especially sensitive, soap is the proper medium for cleansing. And I believe that it should be used at night. Therefore, to remove all the dust accumulations of the day, it is well before retiring to first bathe the face in warm water to soften the skin and then apply a light lather of pure soap, and with the use of the fingers massage this into the skin in a gentle manner, using the correct upward massage stroke and having particular care for the creases about the nose and mouth and chin. Rinse the soap off first in tepid water and then cold, and then pat the skin dry with a soft towel, again using the upward motion. It is bad to rub the face in all directions and vigorously. This roughens the skin and undoes any massage results you may have been trying to obtain.

To prepare the skin finally for the night, a good skin food should be gently rubbed in and allowed to remain on while you sleep. If the skin is inclined to enlarged pores, then an astringent should be used after drying and before the application of the cream.

In the morning the face should be washed first in warm water to remove all traces of grease and finally in cold water and again bathed with an astringent if necessary. The next step is to apply a foundation cream for powder and this should be spread evenly over the skin and any superfluous cream wiped off with the soft towel or sanitary tissue. Powder, good powder of course, when applied on this foundation, will not be injurious to the skin.

Some other time we will go farther and take up the difficulties of caring for skins that are not quite normal and require special treatment. The regulations suggested here are intended for a perfectly healthy skin, which, if we were endowed with the prerogatives of a fairy, my dear ladies, is what each and every one of you would possess without any further to-do in the matter. However, it is a comforting thought that while under a sufficient reason in many cases for their going insane.

As stipendiary magistrate, she has a doctor allowed her and she wished to mention here the great loss she sustained when Dr. Raymond Landry, of Moncton, who was associated with her in this line for some time, left the West and came back to his native home in the East.

She is a member of the committee on mental hygiene, and could state that there is not enough care taken in the careful examination of people coming into our country. But it's a mistake to examine here, after taking their money. Would it not be better policy, better business and fairly good Christianity to do this before we allow them to break up their homes and come here? She suggested the Women's Institutes take more interest in these foreigners in our midst.

Then there is the problem of social disease. Free clinics should be established where all can be treated. Sixty-five people in the jail in her own city were now receiving free treatment from the government.

In their juvenile courts all sixteen years and under came under the Delinquents Act, who otherwise would come under the criminal code. They are held as delinquents, not criminals.

The Children's Protective Act refers to what is called neglected children, the child imperiled of health and morals through bad surroundings. The object of the juvenile courts is protective. They always avoid taking the child from home if it can be prevented. There is never an appearance of arrest. Officers are in plain clothes; girls come with a woman, boys with a man.

Where adults are arrested for contributing to the neglect of the children, they are often made wards of the state, often also where the father is a criminal or they are without parents. Catholic children are put in a Catholic home; Protestant children in a Protestant home. Applications for these children are carefully investigated.

Judge Murphy asked the assistance of the Women's Institutes for the police of our towns and cities. Don't threaten the children with the police, they are our best friends, they warn us of danger. Who would want to lie down in their bed at night if not for our police? "As I see them closing in with the most desperate characters I am filled with admiration for our boys in blue."

Then there is the dope problem—a growing menace to our land. Since the coasts of the United States are so guarded against this smuggling in of drugs, Canada is becoming the dumping ground for this traffic. It is now estimated that one out of every twenty in the United States is addicted to drugs. This is appalling, and young people at that. The traffic is growing; do you know whether it is going on in your town or not? In one battalion in Canada 180 young men were rejected for being drug addicts. The danger to the young girl is grave; once started she can never be reformed and the dissolute people know this and she is their easy prey.

Prohibition is coming, but the fight is only starting. Dope is easily handled, the profits are enormous and the average people are ignorant of the existence of this vice.

Some discussion followed this stirring address.

Asked if the keeping out of Orientals from our land would remedy this growing drug evil, Judge Murphy said she formerly thought it unnecessary, but she was changing her opinion. All suspected as peddlers of this vice should be at once deported at least. She felt that a mistake had been made when we first brought these Orientals to our country in not allowing them to bring their families, as in a lot of men segregated in close quarters vice was bound to breed. The Dominion government had recently taken strong measures requiring every grain of dope handled by druggists to be accounted for, but it was through the smuggling traffic that much was getting in.

An address on Marketing Eggs, was given by Mr. Curran, assistant to Mr. G. R. Wilson, Dominion Poultry Representative for this province.

Mr. Curran expressed his pleasure at being present, and appealed to the Institute to assist Mr. Wilson in the work he is carrying on in their province. There is wide scope for the egg industry to be improved in this province.

He told of the system of marketing, which is carried out in New Brunswick, the same system which they are endeavoring to carry out all over Canada.

It has been tried first in Prince Edward Island, and has proved good. What has been done there, can be done here.

An egg circle was organized there for the marketing of their eggs, the farmers electing their own officers. These eggs were collected, shipped to the candling station, a report sent back and the individual paid according to the quality of his eggs.

Eggs should be collected frequently, and kept in a cool, clean place, not in the pantry behind the kitchen stove, as so often happens. Eggs under those conditions are bound to deteriorate. Care on the part of the producer is essential.

Store keepers are also to blame for the poor quality of eggs; piling the egg crates on the sidewalks, they are bound to take the dampness.

Quality payment system will bring the market to you.

Co-operate with Mr. Wilson, get egg circles started in your community.

The marketing of poultry is another problem of great importance. At the present time the law does not allow the sale of a bird unless drawn. This is a mistake. By this system it is impossible to detect diseased birds, also broken skin invites germs.

He would ask that the Institute, while in session, would make a resolution asking the city councils to remove this by-law. They were now establishing a central marketing station in St. John for marketing poultry. This they expected to be opened in November. Poultry to be shipped live, ducks, turkeys and geese, killed and dressed at home.

Mr. J. C. Farthing, of Moncton, gave a very interesting and instructive talk on physical culture and with the help of several little girls, demonstrated the corrective principles of this physical training as given to the pupils of the public schools. Mr. Farthing himself having charge of this work in the public schools of Moncton.

Another address was given by Prof. F. H. Sexton, Head of the Technical Educational Branch of Halifax, N. S., on Vocational Education. Prof. Sexton said education has been defined as preparation for life; he thought vocational education must then be preparation for livelihood, and went on to show how the farmer, plumber, machinist, etc., through these technical schools, received education along their several lines of work at which they wished to gain their livelihood. He then spoke of the interdependence of town and rural districts during the war and preceding it and of the increasing misunderstanding which seems to exist between them.

The Women's Institutes were particularly fitted to help this to fulfillment—the way the Women's Institutes had carried on work during the war had been a revelation of what can be done by the women of the rural districts. He hoped they would give all possible assistance. Much was being done but the great obstacle to accomplishment was largely financial.

Mr. L. J. Floyd, Provincial Apiarist, gave an interesting and instructive address on Bee Keeping.

He told of bee keeping by the early settlers when they were entirely dependent on the maple tree and the honey bee for their sweets. Sweets were rare before trading was started with the West Indies. Their methods of obtaining the honey were, of course, very different from the methods of the modern hive, the present day method being invented in 1865 by an American.

Bee keeping is a paying industry, there is always a good sale for honey, and also for surplus bees.

Rightly conducted, enough honey can be sold the first year to pay for the investment.

There are now 1000 bee keepers in New Brunswick, mostly in the counties of Carleton, Victoria and York, although a few in all the counties.

INFORMATION FROM THE INSTITUTES OF B. C.

Armstrong Women's Institutes held regular monthly meeting. A very successful demonstration in millinery was given in September, by Mrs. Dawson. This Institute has been very successful in arrangements for serving hot soup or cocoa to the school children who bring their lunches. The Journal would very much appreciate an account of how this was done. Many, indeed all, of our rural schools should have facilities for providing children with something hot and appetizing to supplement the cold lunch, therefore a short story dealing with the difficulties and how they were overcome would be of assistance to many.

Kalamalka Women's Institutes held regular meetings. In September, Mrs. Smith of Naramata, gave a demonstration on "Dehydration of Fruit." The Secretary reports the meeting was open to the public in order that all might have the opportunity of hearing Mrs. Smith's most interesting and instructive lecture. There was an excellent attendance and great interest was manifested in the methods prescribed by Mrs. Smith.

Mount Ida Women's Institutes have been giving attention to such subjects as "Organized Play for School Children," "Medical Inspection of Schools," "Dental Treatment of School Children," "The School Nurse," and "Financial Support to Salmon Arm Hospital." The Secretary reports: "We have money on hand, so thought it would be a good thing to furnish a room at the Salmon Arm Hospital and have it called the Mount Ida Room. In September the Institute had a lecture demonstration by Mrs. P. R. Rich, on "Evaporation of Vegetables and Fruits." The lecturer very kindly promised two pillows towards the furnishing of the Mount Ida Room."

Naramata Women's Institute have been very busy. A fruit shower was planned for a sick member. The fall fair occupied a good deal of attention. This Institute has been very generous in raising funds for the Navy League and the Red Cross. The Secretary reports in November: "A hearty vote of thanks was extended to those who had helped in the fall fair. The fair was a great success, being well attended. The day being fine.

NATIONAL CONVENTION FEDERATED WOMEN'S INSTITUTES OF CANADA.

The date of the National Convention of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada has been set for the week of June beginning with June 20th and ending June 25th, to be held in the City of Edmonton, Alberta. This will be preceded by the annual convention of the Alberta Women's Institutes and the A. W. I. Girls' Clubs. The sessions will be held in the Convocation Hall of the University of Alberta and the Board of Directors of the University have kindly consented to allow the delegates the use of the University residence at the rate of $2.50 per day, this sum to include both board and room. The Alberta committee is arranging a very fine programme, when the leading problems of the day will be discussed, while the speakers will be most outstanding women of Canada.

Comprehensive Plans Whereby Musical Taste Is Being Spread Through the Common Schools

Putting Music Into Manitoba

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

ON two or three occasions I have written of the practical legislative encouragement which has been given to the cause of musical education by Canada's Western provinces. In these comparatively new communities the importance of music as a factor in general culture is taken for granted in a much more definite sense than in the Eastern provinces. In fact in most of the Western provinces music is regarded as a definite public need; and administrators find it good policy to aid the diffusion of musical taste and effort by statutory enactments. The results are being shown in the great enthusiasm with which anything in the way of music of the better order is supported by the general public in the west.

I was recently talking with the organizer of a concert party, which spent the autumn months in Mani-est town in almost the same spirit that the coming of a circus excites everywhere. For that reason legislative bodies find that they have a strong backing of public sentiment in any steps they take to encourage musical education. On the other hand these measures react on the community by improving the standards of public taste.

NEARLY two years ago the leaders of the "Music in the Home" movement in Eastern Canada proclaimed Saskatchewan's musical legislation as a model for emulation by all other Canadian provinces, and details thereof were given in these columns at the time. This month I propose to deal with Manitoba's musical education plan, which proved a success on its initiation last year, and of which even greater results are extoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, giving selections of the high-class ballad order, and without the assistance of the comic singers, whose antics used to be considered a necessary relief to such entertainments. In rural districts. In many towns they were forced to give three concerts in the course of a day, one in the afternoon and two in the evening. The townspeople would be asked to stay away from the first evening programme given at 7.30 p.m., in order that the out-of-town music lovers, some of whom had driven many miles over the prairie, might attend; and at 9.30, after the earlier audience had gone away to their homesteads, the final programme of the day would be sung for the townsfolk. The experience of this particular concert party has no doubt been duplicated by other organizations; and the situation illustrates not merely a wonderfully diffused enthusiasm for music, but a spirit of happy co-operation between town and country in rendering it available to all. It is clear that the farmers of the West view the announcement of a concert in the near-pected in 1921. At the outset it is necessary to say something of the general ideas that lie back of all these plans. It is unnecessary to argue the question of the value of musical culture as an asset in community life. All individuals and organizations which have given serious study to social problems are unanimous on that point. The real question that arises, and which has proven a stumbling block, especially in rural districts, is, how can it be diffused on a broad scale without involving too much effort and expense? The answer is: through the common schools. The public school teacher, urban or rural, with a working knowledge of music, is the real fountain head of music taste in his or her section, who, by influencing the children in the schools, spreads it to the home. But here the real obstacle arises. Where are school teachers with a true knowledge of the rudiments of music to be obtained, especially in a country where a shortage of teachers of any kind prevails? It is that problem with which the West is grappling, by endeavoring to create a body of primary teachers familiar with music in a specialized sense.

The majority of common school teachers in most parts of Canada is drawn from the high school graduates who have qualified for junior and senior leaving certificates. The curriculum of the high schools is already so filled with compulsory and optional subjects, that hitherto pupils of real musical talent on entering such institutions have as a rule been compelled to abandon musical studies. The only solution, obviously was to make music an option also, and to give marks for musical proficiency, which should count in the standing of candidates for teachers' certificates. Fixing the standards of proficiency (for it is clearly out of the question to add the teaching of music to the already heavily burdened high school course), involves another problem which will be dealt with presently.

The encouragement of prospective teachers to qualify in music, was the solution arrived at in Saskatchewan, two or three years ago; and a plan, adopted by the Manitoba Department of Education about a year ago is on similar lines. It is known as "a plan for crediting outside study in music under private instruction." In Manitoba all public instruction is co-ordinated in various grades ascending from grade one, for the little ones, to grades of higher numeration, until the graduation period is attained at the conclusion of grade eleven. Under this plan, credits for personal proficiency in music begin in grade nine with a bonus of 50 marks to the student who can show attainments in theory, and piano or violin. This bonus is credited in the student's total marks at the Departmental Examinations.

In grades ten and eleven the options begin. The student may select music in lieu of any one of the following subjects in the Teachers' Course; Algebra, Geometry, Household Science, Household Art, or Agriculture. The marks allowed for music in these higher grades are high; 70 for the practical test and 30 for theory; of which 42 in the one and 15 in the other represent pass marks. But the tests involved are by no means slipshod or light. To gain the initial bonus of 50 marks in Grade 9, the candidate is obliged to possess a knowledge of the reading of music, notation, expression marks, etc.; a working familiarity with musical history, especially as contained in the lives and works of Bach, Handel and Haydn and a grasp of the principles of harmony. Grades 10 and 11 in their demands carry the student forward into a full knowledge of music in its more complicated forms, later history and biography, acoustics, and many other details of the complex science. A very complete curriculum, involving a splendid range of compositions from which tests are made is included. Indeed, in looking over the lengthy syllabus it is quite obvious that in no way can a lazy student, who has managed to pick up by ear a superficial facility in music, use these options to shirk work. To qualify, he or she must show as careful preparation as in any other subject. Yet in Manitoba, last year, one hundred and eighty students wrote with results which were on the whole satisfactory and better showings are expected this year, now that the plan has passed out of the experimental phase.

THE initial experience showed that greater care must be exercised by students, and the teachers who advise them, in selecting the grade in which they enter as candidates for musical credits. In many instances, last June candidates were graded too high and suffered in examination thereby. Some latitude was shown in permitting candidates to play pieces not included in the list of the year; but this has now been made so comprehensive that it will hereafter be strictly adhered to. It was found also that in most instances the technical work had been poorly prepared and a much greater efficiency will be demanded in future; and the need of a more methodical education in sight-reading and ear-training was apparent.

Manitoba, however, started with adequate machinery for bettering results. It is quite obvious that if the educational authorities are to permit musical credits and place music on the list of options in the higher grades, private musical education must be standardized. Parents and children, ignorant of the subject, might, and in many instances, have been deluded into patronizing ignorant or slothful teachers without knowing that they were being imposed on. Governments cannot go to the length of providing detailed musical instruction for all, and must look to the musical profession itself to set up standards. Therefore, as a corollary step, the Manitoba Music Teachers' Association was formed last March for the purpose of raising the teaching standards in music, and to co-operate with the Department of Education in seeing that credits, options and examinations are properly administered. The tests of last June, showed that such an organization had come into the field none too soon. The association has other purposes which need not be dealt with; and is in reality a federation of several local associations which had already rendered service in promoting the recognition of music in teachers' courses. Within the past ten years a considerable number of musicians of very wide training and experience have taken up residence in Manitoba, and there is a growing coterie of able young musicians native to the province, who have enjoyed the advantages of musical education, not only in the Conservatories of Eastern Canada and the United States, but in Europe. Such a musician is Miss Eva Clare, a native of Neepawa, Manitoba, and now resident in Winnipeg, who was chosen as first President of the provincial body; and on the executive are well-known and efficient instructors like Mr. Rhys Thomas and Mr. James W. Matthews of Winnipeg, Principal Wright of Brandon College, Miss Pearl Tucker of Dauphin, and Mr. D. B. McHardy of Gladstone, the latter of whom serves as Secretary-treasurer. Viewed as a whole, Manitoba's plan for the diffusion of musical taste and knowledge seems to rest on well-laid foundations.

Head of the Wm. J. Burns International Detective Agency.

From actual photograph taken at Edison Shop, New York City.

Mr. Edison selected William J. Burns, the great detective, as the most sophisticated man in New York, and Mr. Burns gladly made the test to assist Mr. Edison in his research work. Mr. Burns' chart is reproduced. It registers a decided mood change, but it represents the emotional effects of music only on one man. Mr. Edison needs thousands of these charts, because his research work must be conducted on the law of averages.

Will You Join Mr. Edison in an Experiment?

For many centuries, the power of music has been appreciated—but never has it been fully understood. For the purpose of ascertaining and classifying the effects of music on the minds and moods of mankind, Mr. Edison has associated with himself world-famed psychologists.

Will you assist by analyzing your own mental reactions to music, and those of as many friends as you can interest in the work?

Please examine the chart that is reproduced above. The Edison dealer in your locality will furnish you as many of these charts as you require.

If you do not own a New Edison, the Edison dealer in your locality will welcome your making the test in his store. Should you like to call in some of your friends, the Edison dealer will probably be willing to loan you an instrument and the necessary RE-CREATIONS so that you can make the test in your own home. Watch for his announcement in your local newspaper.

a perfect skin cannot be bestowed upon you magically, by earnest endeavor it can assuredly be acquired.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DUNDAS.—Of course you cannot keep powder on your nose, my friend, if your skin is dry and you provide nothing to which it may adhere. This condition, as you doubtless know, is caused by a lack of good circulation and the absence of fat in the skin. Daily massage with a good skin-food is necessary—all lotions containing alcohol, borax, ammonia, zinc or similar chemicals are to be avoided. Eat nutritious foods and do not fail to take daily out-door exercise. After bathing the face in warm water and pure soap at night, a lotion, the formula of which I shall send you, may be used for massage. You may find that this treatment will also clear up the pimples. As for the whiteheads, or milium, the proper treatment for these is to open each with a very fine lancet, which you must be sure is properly sterilized, press out the contents, and use a little peroxide on the part cut to prevent infection. I shall also send you the formula for a hair tonic when I write. I am glad to find my readers taking an increased interest in their appearance.

Canadian Women's Institutes

visitors were present from Summerland and Penticton. Mr. J. W. Jones, M.L.A., of Kelowna, gave the opening address."

Okanagan Centre and Woods Lake Women's Institute held regular meetings. At the October meeting a resolution was unanimously passed requesting Government assistance to establish public health centres and maintain public health nurses. This resolution is to be submitted for discussion at the district conference to be held in Penticton. It is hoped that the resolution will receive the unanimous support not only of the Conference but of the Institutes throughout the Province.

Peachland Women's Institutes have held regular meetings. This Institute has been very active in improving the school grounds and by the expenditure of a generous sum of money have entitled the school board to the Government grant which is provided by the Department of Education for this purpose. The Secretary reports for October: The Peachland Annual Fair and Flower Show was held on October 14th. The entries were all good. The total receipts were $58.15. A very successful baby clinic was held in connection with the fair. Seven small citizens were examined.

Rutland Women's Institutes has been active in public health efforts. In August a splendid demonstration on Canning, with a community canning plant, when 60 cans of pears, string beans and corn were put up in a scientific and expeditious manner.

Salmon Arm Women's Institutes have held meetings as usual. This Institute has done splendid work in their school fair, and has also been successful in making their last payment on a piano.

Salmon River Valley Women's Institutes have held regular meetings. The Secretary reports: "We held our flower show and exhibition of women's work and school children's work on August 19th. The total proceeds were $23.00. Having $15.00 to spare for an addition to our library, we discussed what books would be suitable to purchase. On November 11th, there was a discussion on vegetables in the diet. The roads were very bad which made the attendance small. Nineteen new books were added to the library."

Silver Creek Women's Institutes have held usual meetings. A very interesting account was sent in in the monthly report for October. The Secretary, Mrs. Elgood, read a paper on "The Uniform Certificate for Teachers in B. C." The discussion following was very interesting. The roll call was answered by each member reading an account of her experiences on first arriving in B. C. The Institute members planted perennials and trees in the school grounds this fall, and Mr. Wright ploughed a deep border all around the edge of the playground.

Similkameen Women's Institutes held regular meetings. On November 11th a very interesting meeting was held. Mrs. McCallum read a paper on "Madame Montessori's Teachings." Mrs. Wright gave a reading. The Secretary reports: "We had a sale of work on Nov. 5th, and after our expenses were paid our net proceeds amounted to $151.50. As the town is badly in need of a good hall, the Institute decided to give $210.00 towards the erection of a building which will be known as the Victory Hall."

West Summerland Women's Institute held regular meetings. Mrs. M. B. Smith, of Naramata, gave a lecture demonstration on "Dehydration of Fruit." on October 8th. The Secretary reports: "There was very little business at this meeting, most of the afternoon being taken up by Mrs. Smith's talk on 'Evaporating Fruit.' She went thoroughly into details, emphasizing the necessity of drying fruits to save waste in the orchards. Her little show boxes of the finished product were on exhibition so everyone had a chance of seeing the results. In November, the speakers were Dr. Andrew, Mr. William Kerr and Mrs. Fosberry. Dr. Andrew gave a splendid paper on 'Health' taking as his subjects, 'The proper food for growing children,' and 'Mouth Infection.' Mr. Kerr spoke of the Island of Iona, and Mrs. Fosberry spoke on the Canadian Women's Press Club."

The Journal Puzzle for February

By TOM WOOD

If the eight pictures are guessed correctly and placed in proper order, the initials spell a certain month in the year, and the initials, the birthstone for the same. The row of young women at the bottom of the panel represent the twelve months of the year. Which one is February? How do you recognize her?

Two prizes will be given—first, two dollars, and second, one dollar—for the best solutions, judged according to neatness and accuracy.

All are eligible to compete. Answers must be received by February 20th to be included.

Correct Solution of the December Puzzle

The correct solution of the December puzzle is:—1, Sty; 2, Hindu; 3, Owl; 4, Rose; 5, Teapot; 6, Eli; 7, Seaweed; 8, Tree.

“Shortest” (Day).

First prize: Master Berford Stayner, 21 James St. East, Brockville, Ont. Second prize: Master Walter F. Harris, Box 513, Red Deer, Alta.

The Royal Baking Service

The Royal Educational Department

Editor's Note—Waffles! Griddle Cakes! Biscuits! There is nothing which requires so little time and trouble and yet returns so much in family health and happiness as these foods when baked at home with Royal Baking Powder!

Day in and day out, the Royal Educational Department is discovering new facts in baking. Thousands of women know the never-failing accuracy and delight of Royal Recipes. But there is more of a service in this department's work than just the publication of recipes. The department is really headquarters for all baking information, which it gives freely on request to every user of Royal Baking Powder.

Prize Griddle Cakes and Waffles

To Get First Prize

TO make a perfect waffle—one that would capture first prize at a food show is easy if the Royal recipe given on this page is used. The waffle should be about half an inch thick, evenly browned, crisp outside—and soft and tender within. Sugar is never used in a perfect waffle batter, for the waffles are served with sugar or syrup.

To Prevent Hard Edged Griddle Cakes

GREASE the griddle only enough to keep the cakes from sticking if you want them light and fluffy on the edges as well as in the center. Too much grease causes the cakes to “draw” on the edges and to fry brittle and hard.

Greasing the Waffle Iron

JUST the opposite from greasing the griddle, the waffle iron should be greased very well indeed to prevent the waffle from sticking to the iron. The waffle iron should be very hot—almost smoking—when the batter is poured in.

How to Fill the Waffle Iron

WITH a tablespoon pour just enough batter into the iron to permit the grooves to be filled evenly but not covering the tops of the black squares; close the iron and count twenty slowly; then turn the iron and count fifteen slowly. If too much batter is put in, the waffle will be too thick, and will take so long to bake that it will become tough and leathery.

When to Turn Griddle Cakes

WHEN small light bubbles appear evenly covering the griddle cake, and by lifting the edge of the cake, a delicate brown shows underneath, it should be turned—but turned only once! Twice turning cakes will make them tough and soggy.

To Keep Pancakes Light

THE finest baked griddle cake will become soggy with steam if it is put on a cold plate. Slip it from the griddle to a hot plate, but do not flap it over again. Never pile more than four cakes on a plate as a larger number will be apt to steam upon standing, also making the cakes soggy.

Eggless Griddle Cakes and Waffles

IF you have a griddle cake or waffle recipe calling for two or three eggs, one or more of the eggs may be omitted by adding about a spoonful of Royal Baking Powder in place of each. Royal, however, is one of the very few baking powders that can be used in place of eggs in this way, as some baking powders leave a bitter taste in the food.

A New Way to Serve Pancakes

WITH a thinner pancake batter make large-sized pancakes—large as the pan will hold. Then place four together with butter and syrup or jelly between each cake, and cut in pie-shaped pieces for serving—making four servings from each plateful.

The New Royal Cook Book Free

All of the recipes which you have liked so well on Royal pages together with many new recipes and discoveries, are given in our New Royal Cook Book. Write for your copy. It is free. If you send us the names and addresses of three friends interested in home baking we will supply them also free of charge.

Royal Hot Griddle Cakes

- |                                 |                         |
|---------------------------------|-------------------------|
| 1 3/4 cups flour                | 2 eggs                  |
| 1/2 teaspoon salt               | 1 1/2 cups milk         |
| 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder | 1 tablespoon shortening |

Mix and sift dry ingredients; add beaten eggs, milk and melted shortening; mix well. Bake immediately on hot griddle. Serve with butter and maple syrup.

French Pancakes

- |                                 |                    |
|---------------------------------|--------------------|
| 1 cup flour                     | 1 tablespoon sugar |
| 2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder | 2 cups milk        |
| 1/2 teaspoon salt               | 1/2 cup cream      |
| 2 eggs                          | jam                |
|                                 | powdered sugar     |

Sift together flour, Royal Baking Powder and salt. Add eggs which have been beaten with the sugar and to which milk and cream have been added. Batter should be very thin. Heat small frying pan in which a little butter has been melted. Pour in just sufficient batter to cover bottom of pan. Cook over hot fire. Turn and brown other side. Spread with jam or preserves and roll up. Sprinkle with a little powdered sugar and serve hot.

Royal Eggless Griddle Cakes

- |                                 |  |
|---------------------------------|--|
| 2 cups flour                    |  |
| 1/2 teaspoon salt               |  |
| 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |  |
| 1 1/2 cups milk                 |  |
| 2 tablespoons shortening        |  |

Mix and sift dry ingredients; add milk and melted shortening; beat well. Bake on slightly greased hot griddle. Serve hot with butter and syrup.

Waffles

- |                                 |                                |
|---------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 2 cups flour                    | 1 3/4 cups milk                |
| 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder | 2 eggs                         |
| 3/4 teaspoon salt               | 1 tablespoon melted shortening |

Sift flour, Royal Baking Powder and salt together; add milk to yolks of eggs; mix thoroughly and add to dry ingredients; add melted shortening and mix in beaten whites of eggs. Bake in well greased hot waffle iron until brown. Serve hot with maple syrup. It should take about one minute to bake each waffle.

Buckwheat Cakes

- |                                   |  |
|-----------------------------------|--|
| 2 cups buckwheat flour            |  |
| 1 cup flour                       |  |
| 6 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder   |  |
| 1 1/2 teaspoons salt              |  |
| 2 1/2 cups milk or milk and water |  |
| 1 tablespoon molasses             |  |
| 1 tablespoon shortening           |  |

Sift together flours, Royal Baking Powder and salt; add liquid, molasses and melted shortening; beat three minutes. Bake on hot greased griddle.

Rice Griddle Cakes

- |                        |                                 |
|------------------------|---------------------------------|
| 1 cup boiled rice      | 1 egg                           |
| 1 cup milk             | 1 cup flour                     |
| 2 teaspoons shortening | 2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |
| 1 teaspoon salt        |                                 |

Mix rice, milk, melted shortening, salt and well-beaten egg; stir in flour and baking powder which have been sifted together; mix well. Bake on hot greased griddle.

NOTE: Royal cans are always full weight. To avoid spilling the powder, shake down contents before opening and hold bottom of can firmly. Slowly twist off cover.

Delightful Frocks for Afternoon Wear

9265—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Width at lower edge about 1 1/4 yard. Size 36 requires 5 1/2 yards 36-inch satin—1 7/8 yard lining for underbody and top of gores. This dress is a charming example of the new early Spring mode. It is made on the modified princess lines, with draping at the sides, giving the side fulness so prevalent in the new models. One of the greatest beauties of the frock is its simplicity, for it is untrimmed and depends for its effect on the richness of the satin and the perfection of line. Pippings of contrasting satin make an effective finish.

9294—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about 1 1/4 yard. Size 36 requires 3 1/2 yards 36-inch duvetyn—1 1/2 yard 36-inch satin for collar and waist—1 yard 36-inch lining. The dress is one of that most useful type appropriate for street wear when the weather permits the discarding of the coat, and dressy enough to look exceedingly smart at tea or in a restaurant. The lines are excellent, and the draping of the front tunic gives the required side fulness. The points of the drapery hang below the underskirt. The front is embroidered in silk floss and metal thread in design 12576. Tiny acorn buttons trim the edges of the three-quarter sleeves, the upper edges of the side openings, and the cloth belt.

9286—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about 1 1/4 yard. Size 36 requires 4 1/2 yards 40-inch figured Georgette crêpe for overdress—2 3/4 yards 36-inch satin for underdress—1 1/8 yard 36-inch lining. This is a charmingly youthful model, and in its use of figured material it conforms to the latest dictates from Palm Beach. The sleeves are short and finished with tucks, the waist has long lines, a U-shaped neck, and a crushed sash of the material marking the low waist-line and tying at the side. The overdress is gathered to the long waist and is tucked to the hem, the tucks of even depth. The overdress is slit at the sides, transforming it into panels, and showing the satin under-skirt. Plain Georgette and satin, or plain and figured foulard would combine effectively in this charming model.

will be found, priced within the reach of every woman, at those stores where a superior and individual service assures you the corset best suited to your needs. The conspicuous superiority of these original front lacing corsets has given them unquestioned prestige that it is our pride to guard jealously by making each and every Gossard as perfect as true artistry, fine workmanship and the highest grade of materials can make it. This pride of leadership is your best assurance that every Gossard Corset offers you the true economy of unequalled value.

The Canadian H. W. Gossard Co., Limited 366-378 West Adelaide St., Toronto, Can.

The adoption of a mode of dressing that is genuinely artistic and becoming depends upon a woman's understanding of physical beauty. She must understand what it means to stand erect without conscious effort; that erect carriage is essential to dignity and grace of movement; that the appearance of proper height is largely a matter of suggestion. A woman will look ungainly tall or give the appearance of being "squatty" as her body is improperly proportioned by incorrect corsetry. The proper proportions of correct corsetry unfailingly give the impression of graceful height. She must know the necessity of absolute freedom for the muscles of respiration, and that any garment that handicaps free breathing, mars her speaking voice and undermines the entire system.

There is a tendency to overlook the individual solution of the problems of dress. Particularly this has been true in the selection of corsets. But as more and more women have come to a better understanding of those unvarying principles of beauty and good taste that must be the foundation of all becomingness in dress, Gossard Corsets have found an undisputed place in the wardrobes of the world's best dressed women.

If you have never worn a Gossard Corset you will marvel at the artistry that has anticipated your needs with models that seem to have been created for you alone. There is not a type of figure so unusual or difficult to fit but can be gently persuaded into graceful lines and proportions with the proper Gossard Corset. And to this grace of outline, these original front lacing corsets add the comfort and beauty of unrestrained movement expressed in poise and distinction of carriage; a correct support that induces proper breathing and protects the organs of nutrition; and a wearing service far beyond the life of the average corset.

Princess Lines in New Spring Frocks

9254—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yards. Size 36 requires 3½ yards 36-inch tricotine—1 yard ribbon for trimming—½ yard tucked net for chemise. The dress has the three-quarter length and is shown here with the flat-panel front and back, and is also shown in the side view. The dress is trimmed with a wide band of the low waist line at the waist. The deep V-neck collar is adorned with the V, is emphasized by a stitched trimming-band of contrasting fabric. A piece of ribbon join the V sides to net chemise.

9288—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 5½ yards 36-inch crêpe de Chine—¾ yard 36-inch white crêpe de Chine for trimming. The overdress is elaborately embroidered in heavy couching of wool in design 12612. The band of white trimming down the front of the underdress is marked at intervals of about an inch with tiny satin buttons. A deep Tuxedo collar on the overdress is made of the crêpe de Chine unembroidered. The U-neck-line is a very becoming feature. Elbow sleeves are set into a natural shoulder with cording, and cording marks the tiny yoke on the shoulders. This is a charming frock for semidress afternoon service, yet it is simple enough for street wear.

9271—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 3½ yards 36-inch velveteen—½ yard 36-inch satin for collar and cuff facing. The dress is simple in line and very smart. A panel, hanging from the shoulders almost to the hem, is pointed at the bottom and trimmed at the sides with flat buttons and corded buttonholes. The round neck is broken in the middle of the front, and the break is looped by tiny bands of braid.

9271—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about 2½ yards. Size 36 requires 3½ yards 54-inch tricotine—¾ yard 36-inch satin for collar—¾ yard duvetyn for vest—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The skirt is embroidered in design 12556, and coarse silk, wool, chenille, or beads would be effective in working it out. This dress shows one especially interesting feature of the Spring mode—the fuller skirt. In this model the fulness is confined to the sides by means of inverted plaits. Gathers at the underarm edges give a draped effect front and back at the waist-line. The long rolling collar is widened at the back and over the shoulders by a narrow band of white satin, trimmed with buttons and tiny loops. This same form of trimming is used on the cuffs.

9252—Ladies' Overblouse. Designed for 32 to 44 bust. No. 8962—Ladies' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 7 yards 36-inch foulard—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The very smartest frocks at Palm Beach are being made of foulard this season, and that is a sure sign of the times. Floral designs and polka dots are highest in favor, and the colors are very gay. As with this dress, the lines are simple, and there is little or no trimming. Here we see a cross-over bodice, and a three-tiered skirt. The long, close-fitting sleeves make this thoroughly appropriate for street wear, when the weather permits the discarding of top coats. This vogue for foulards is going to prove a boon to all who enjoy a dress of Summer silk that combines smartness with comfort. The variety seen in colors and designs will give everyone a chance to satisfy the most fastidious taste. Lovely shades of green are popular, and there is the usual gamut of blues and tans. With such a dress silk stockings should be worn to match the frock, for Dame Fashion decrees that the stockings be of any color except that of the shoes.

HOW I EARN MONEY AT HOME

AND IN THIS WAY MAKE UP FOR HENRY'S SHRINKING SALARY

Every Wife or Self-Supporting Girl Can Use Extra Money for Clothes. Thousands Are Now Making It Themselves — Right at Home — in this Easy Way.

By MARY WALDEN

ILLUSTRATION BY F. M. McANALLY

MY dear, you should have seen her at church this morning. She looked positively 'dowdy.' It's a shame! Mary used to be such a well-dressed girl—until she married that bank-clerk. I should think he'd feel like—

"Sh-h-h! She's on this car. Over behind you. She might hear."

The street car was crowded and they hadn't noticed me before, but I had heard—and my face flushed red with resentment and shame. It was true—I did look "dowdy"—and I knew it. There is nothing quite so depressing to a woman as an old hat and old clothes on a bright Sunday morning in Springtime.

I got off the street car at the next corner and walked the remaining blocks to my home—and Henry. My cup of bitterness had spilled over and I needed a few minutes to choke back the tears that wanted to run down my burning cheeks.

I didn't want to make Henry feel worse than he did already about our money situation. My husband is one of the "white-collar men" whose salaries haven't kept pace with the mounting cost of living. I had been a private secretary, earning a comfortable living for myself, when we had married, and since the cost of everything had kept rising higher and higher, I had sometimes hinted to Henry that I would be glad to take a position again, but he had always vetoed the idea strenuously. Henry was "old-fashioned" and proud. His wife should never have to "go to work"—so I had gone on skimping and scraping—and wearing "made-overs."

But the bitter experience of this Sunday morning was too much. I resolved as I walked homeward that, Henry or no Henry, I was going to find a way to make extra money for clothes, and do it, at least until things took a turn for the better.

When I got home I was prepared to be cheerful as usual, but Henry was comfortably smoking and absorbed in his Sunday paper, and his contentment somehow irritated me terribly. To make matters worse, he held up the magazine-picture section of the paper as I came into the room, and remarked that he had never seen the girls wear "such good-looking" duds as they do this year."

Henry is really a perfect dear and adores me, but he should have had more sense. He sometimes shows no more comprehension of a woman's pride than a care-free Airedale puppy. I lost my temper, snatched the paper from him, and cried:

"If you like to see nice clothes so much, why don't you buy your wife some of them?"

Then I rushed to my room, still carrying the Magazine Section of course, in time—but while things are so expensive, and your salary doesn't keep pace, isn't it fine that I can make this money for the clothes I need, and the little pleasures and necessities we couldn't afford otherwise?"

Then I made my final attack upon Henry's old-fashioned idea that "my wife doesn't have to work."

"You know as well as I do," I said "that it is the middle-class people who are having the struggle nowadays. Everybody knows it. Look at the married sometimes to make warm little knitted things for my little girl to wear.

A few evenings ago little Helen was riding on Henry's foot and she asked him to "sing a tune" for her, so he made this up, while he looked teasingly at me:

"Mary, Mary, quite contrary,
How does your income grow?
By Auto Knitting hosiery,
And woollen socks all in a row!"

Henry hasn't forgotten that I took up Auto Knitting without asking his advice, but he is glad now that I did, for it helped us over the hard spots by turning spare hours into dollars.

Whenever I hear a woman complaining about the high cost of living and clothes, I always try to tell her how the Auto Knitter will help her to make money at home in spare time. I tell her why the Auto Knitter Company, an old, firmly established Canadian corporation, prefers socks of home manufacture to those produced in rushing, driving factories. I explain how their wide business connections give them an enormous market for the good, honest, old-time wool socks, made by hand on the Auto Knitters of their home workers. Then I tell her, just as I am telling you, that the Auto Knitter Company will make a contract with each of their workers, to pay her a liberal, guaranteed wage, on a piece-work basis.

This contract leaves you perfectly free—you can work for them as much as you want, or as little—spare time or full time—or not at all—yet for every shipment of socks you send them you get your pay check—promptly.

You are, of course, at liberty to dispose of the output of your Auto Knitter as you see fit; you can also use the Auto Knitter to make, at a remarkably low cost, all the hosiery your family needs.

But remember this: There are absolutely no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight out-and-out employment agreement at a Fixed Wage on a piece-work basis—a good pay for your services alone.

No matter where you live I feel sure that you want to know all about the machine that has meant so much to me. By all means write to the Auto Knitter Company, Dept. 1352-K, 1870 Davenport Rd., Toronto, Ont., at once and find out about the pleasant occupation waiting for you—Auto Knitting. Find out what substantial amounts even a part of your spare time will earn for you.

Remember that experience is unnecessary; that you do not need to know how to knit. The Auto Knitter does the work.

I can never be thankful enough that I didn't put off writing for information about it that Sunday evening when I took the paper away from Henry, and opened it later at the Auto Knitter advertisement.

You will never regret writing for it, either. Send us your name and address now and find out all the good things that are in store for you.

the paper, shut the door, and threw myself across the bed for a good cry. Henry came and knocked and spoke to me, but I wouldn't let him in.

After a while I sat up and began to idly turn the pages of the paper I had taken away from Henry. All of a sudden I sat up straighter and gasped. A woman was looking out of the page at me, holding a bank-check in her hand, and across the top of the page were the words, "How I Make Money—Right at Home!"

I devoured every word of the advertisement. When I had finished I felt that I had found the work I was looking for. I resolved to write for the particulars, but to keep it a secret from my husband. After a while I went out and made up with him, got dinner ready, and we had a happy afternoon together. That night I mailed the coupon from the advertisement to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company.

To make my story short, I found their prospectus so convincing and reasonable that I sent for and received an Auto Knitting outfit, including the wonderful little machine, the Auto Knitter.

I kept the machine in the bottom drawer of my bureau while Henry was in the house. While he was at the bank I used it every minute I could spare from my housework. At the end of a month I sent my first shipment of soft, warm, well-knit wool socks to the company. By return mail came my first check—and oh joy! the thrill of the sight of that first check.

I was bubbling with happiness, and anxiety to tell Henry—but I waited until the next evening. Then, when he came home from the bank, I presented myself before him in the pretty new accordeon-pleated frock that I had seen advertised in Taylor and Parks' sale announcement in the paper.

Henry's mouth opened and he just stared at me in admiration, without a word. Finally he managed to say,

"Where did you get it, Mary?"

"I earned it!" I replied brightly, not sure just how he would take the news.

Henry looked for a minute as if I had said I had stolen it. Then I made him sit down and hear what I had to say.

"Now listen, dear," I said, gently, but firmly, "don't you think it is perfectly ridiculous for us to pretend that you earn enough money—just now? You will, of women who have taken business positions to help out their husbands! Nobody thinks the worse of them for it. Isn't my plan for making money in spare time at home, without neglecting you or little Helen, better than taking a position? Why, nobody needs to know a thing about it!"

That fetched Henry, as I was sure it would. He said,

"Well, you've been a 'contrary Mary'—but I guess you're right. Let's see how you do it."

So I took the light, portable Auto Knitter out of the bureau drawer, quickly clamped it to the table, and showed Henry how easily it worked. I had had enough practice by that time so that I made a pair of socks so quickly that Henry's eyes nearly popped out of his head.

"And you say the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company buys the socks from you?" he asked.

"Yes," I said, "they guarantee to always take every pair I make—at a guaranteed price. And they pay the transportation charges on ten dozen pairs or over, besides sending me the yarn to replace the amount used for the socks I have sent them. So you see the yarn hasn't cost me anything since the first lot. I didn't really need to buy any yarn to start work, for a generous amount was given free with the Auto Knitter."

Henry was certainly astonished, and when he saw how easy and pleasant the work was he said he had no objection to my continuing it. So I kept on Auto Knitting, sending the socks I made to the Auto Knitter Company, and getting my checks back promptly for every shipment.

The result was that I didn't have to go without any of the Summer things I needed for myself or little Helen last Summer, and the Auto Knitter again helped to solve the clothes problem the following Fall and Winter. All this without my being obliged to touch a cent of what I call "the family money"—the money that Henry makes. He is succeeding much better now, but I still use the Auto Knitter regularly—sometimes making socks to send to Toronto, sometimes making them to sell to friends who have seen the strong, warm, long-wearing Auto Knitter Hosiery and want some of it; and

Sartorial Success In Gowns for Stout Women

9183—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{3}{4}$  yards 54-inch tricotine— $2\frac{1}{4}$  yard metal ribbon— $2\frac{1}{4}$  yards moire ribbon for girdle— $\frac{1}{4}$  yard embroidered batiste for collar— $2\frac{3}{4}$  yards 36-inch lining for underbody and top of skirt. This dress, which is especially fitted to the stout figure in its lines, has a deep open front with rolling collar, and a two-piece skirt laid in plaits at the top. The waist-line is marked with ovals of soutache braiding in design 12426, and the fulness is held in with a narrow sash. After a new fashion whim, narrow bands of metal ribbon provide the decorative note. The dress is in redingote style, the sleeveless redingote extending almost to the lower edge of the skirt. This is a two-piece model closing at the left only front and attached to the front-closing underbody. The sleeves are sewed into the armholes of the underbody.

9218—Ladies' Tunic Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8295—Ladies' Two-piece Dart-fitted Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires  $5\frac{3}{4}$  yards 40-inch Georgette crepe— $\frac{1}{4}$  yard filet lace,  $\frac{3}{8}$  yard Georgette for vest— $2\frac{1}{2}$  yards ribbon for girdle— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The fronts of the frock are rolled back in revers from a vest of Georgette which is marked off into a plaid effect by lines of drawn work. These long revers give smart slender lines to the full figure and the whole style of the dress is designed to add height and stateliness. The dress is worked out in Georgette crepe but it is equally suitable for satin, charmeuse, or crêpe de Chine; embroidered batiste, filet lace, or embroidered Georgette may be used for the trimming-band at the top of the vest.

9067—Ladies' Long-waisted Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{8}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{3}{8}$  yards 36-inch satin for waist, sleeves, and skirt— $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard 54-inch tricotine for tunic and flare collar—5 yards soutache braid to trim collar and revers— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard Georgette crepe for vest— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The low waist-line is very becoming to the full figure, and on this model it is emphasized with a braiding motif in design 12426. The fronts of the sleeveless, slip-on waist are crossed in surplice style and rolled back with the straight collar showing the vestee. The sleeves are the smart long, close-fitting ones of the present mode, and are trimmed with flat stitched cuffs, fitting snugly about the wrists.

9002—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $3\frac{3}{8}$  yards 54-inch tricotine— $\frac{1}{2}$  yard 36-inch satin for collar and vest— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. A high Directoire collar of satin rolls over at the back of the redingote, and this with the comfortable opening in front forms a very smart neck finish. The redingote is caught together at the top, opening slightly below to show a narrow inserted vest of satin, and embroidered motifs in design 12510 may be worked in heavy rope silk or chenille on the front edges. One of the smart new cord girdles outlines the waist and a row of bone buttons trims the long plain, close-fitting sleeves. A frock like this would be a very useful addition to the wardrobe of the stout woman, as, tho cut on smart lines, it tends to slenderize the figure. With a fur neck-piece it would make a good-looking street costume for pleasant days in early Spring.

Dainty New Lingerie

With a Word or Two About Corsets and Negligee

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

A luxurious negligee of Nile green crepe de Chine embroidered with silver thread. The pointed cape back forms the sleeves, and the fringe is self colored. The boudoir cap is a scarf, bound around the head in true Eastern fashion.

WHEN the millennium shall have dawned, suffusing life with rose tints and all the things we have ever longed for shall be ours at last, then, every woman will have soft, clinging silk negligee, in which to rest, to be feminine and to be pretty. Whether she be a Judge of the Court, a magistrate, an alderman or just plain wife and mother, when the day's work is done, in the seclusion of her boudoir, each one will snuggle into the prettiest and cosiest negligee that ever was, to rest, to read, or perhaps plan the next day's work.

Negligees have been worn very much more the past five or six years than they were for a few years previous. Strange as it may seem, the war appears to have revived their vogue. A casual reflection of women's war time raiment recalls military and Nursing Sisters' uniforms, the garb of the farmerette, the munitionette and other substantial clothing far removed from the frivolity of a soft and clinging negligee. But the vogue of the negligee has been explained something like this: Women war-workers, weary of their masculine and near-masculine attire, as well as the hardships of the work that invoked it, bethought themselves of dainty negligees which are the epitome of all that is feminine in raiment, gathered its folds about them and relaxed. This may or may not be the correct explanation, but it sounds plausible.

The shops are displaying gorgeous creations in all the delicate pastel shades in Georgette crepe, satin, crepe de Chine, lace and net, and the two illustrations on this page depict two of the most alluring models.

Lingerie and corsets are very closely allied with negligee, and this season's vintage is both pretty and practical.

To begin with corsets, which dressmakers tell us should be the foundation of every costume, the new models which have been designed for next spring, have the same low tops of this season, but they are tighter around the lower edge of the skirt, and a new departure, one progressive firm is making, is the placing of the elastic suspender a couple of inches above the edge instead of sewing it in with the binding. This is supposed to relieve the strain on both suspender and corset. There are some new athletic models, very soft and pliable with the minimum of boning, and cut away across the front so as to allow all the freedom possible when worn as a sports or negligee corset. And speaking of the negligee corset, there is a rather clever model, shown for the first time in the spring collection. It is a combination of corset and bandeau, the net top which hooks down the back being a bandeau to all intents and purposes, and the skirt, which dips in front and has a suspender attached to either side, is of satin—it is made in cou-til also—and has three bones, an upright one in the centre and on either side another leaning slightly away from the centre.

The model for this sketch was a flesh-tinted crepe de Chine chemise. The top is filet lace, and the skirt, which is laid in wide tucks pressed, not stitched, has an edging of pointed filet lace.

Just in case some bride-to-be is scanning this page for trousseau suggestions, one would like to mention a very exquisite front lace confection in the way of a lace corset, made over a heavy net foundation. Needless to say it was lightly boned and was all white, save the pink rosebuds (nestling in the corsage) and the pink suspenders.

It would be interesting to take up the relative merits of front and back lacing corsets, but that would take too much space; we shall just pause long enough to advise those who desire to have comfort in their corsets, to buy a good quality and to always have their corset, their brassiere and their bandeau fitted.

LOOKING back over a few years, one almost gasps at the transformation that has taken place in undergarments in the meantime. Some very wise and liberal-minded people are inclined to be captious over some of the lingerie displayed in the shop windows, and no one could help agreeing that some of it is horribly hectic. But, if the merchant were to take you into his confidence, he would probably tell you that some of it he never expected to sell; it was just made for window display and exaggerated like a poster, so don't take these extreme things too seriously. Think of the really good wearing satin, crepe de Chine, glove silk and habutai which the self-sustaining girl, at the risk of being accused of extravagance, buys because the restrictions of her domestic arrangements, limit her laundry operations to the minimum, and none know better than she, that cleanliness is next to godliness. If she were to wear the substantial cotton undergarment that her grandmother before her did, and laundry prices what they are to-day—well, no wonder she buys silk.

Grey satin panne, which is one of the new and lustrous weaves, was the choice of the designer who fashioned this very practical and really pretty negligee. Coral pipings lend harmonious contrast to the grey.

We used to have only a bowing acquaintance with silk garments of any kind and they were kept for formal occasions. But while the war raged, we became better acquainted with it and were told that to wear silk was to be patriotic because we were saving wool and cotton for soldiers' uniforms and munitions, respectively. And silk is like some of the people we meet—the better we know them, the better we like them.

The tucked bolero yoke, edged with Valenciennes lace, and the coquettish fashioning of the shoulder are the new features of this robe de nuit, which is made of jersey crepe, also a new weave.

One was told by the head of a lingerie department that silk underwear sold better at Christmas than any other kind.

The "robe de nuit" which is shown, is one of the latest triumphs of the designer of garments of this kind. The fabric is crepe jersey in a dainty pink, trimmed with Val. lace. If you look at it closely, you will see that the deep yoke is tucked and fashioned like a bolero, and there are no sleeves, the edge of the arm's eye drooping over the curve of the shoulder. This seems to be a very popular substitute for a sleeve.

It is truly amazing how many versions of the envelope chemise one finds in the stores, and in spite of the length of time, they have been "in," there is no other garment as much liked. Next to camisoles, there were more envelope chemises sold at Christmas than any other type of undergarment. There are one or two new styles shown for spring. One of them is the rather wide skirted combination with elastic around the waist, and if it is to be worn with an evening dress, the top is straight and with elastic run through a casing and no shoulder straps. Most of the combinations as well as camisoles have ribbon straps instead of the built-up shoulder.

The panel envelope, which is the name given a new variety of this garment, may not quite suggest its nature. To be more explicit, it is made out of a piece of material just double the length of the garment, which is sewn together at the sides, within six inches of the lower edge, and joined at the top to a yoke with a lace edging. The lower edge which is a fold, is cut across from either side, leaving a few inches in the centre, thus the panel front continues under the body and up the back. The edge and side slashes have a ruffle of narrow lace.

Two-faced ribbon, pink and blue, mauve and pink and other combinations are twisted into pretty cords with which flowers, scrolls and bows are outlined. Dainty little bows are also fashioned from it and tacked on envelopes, gowns, camisoles and other garments.

ALL the cuddly soft baby things—that tiny nightie, the little dress you have embroidered so carefully—can be popped into the gleaming copper tub of the 1900. Out they come, snowy white and fresh, to adorn baby's chubby, pink person!

In fact, everything can be washed in the 1900, even heavy sheets or blankets. The cleansing, soapy water rushes back and forth through the clothes in that magic figure 8 movement, swishing through them with every motion of the tub, and four times as often as in the ordinary washer! This figure 8 movement is the magic, exclusive feature that makes the 1900 the perfect washing machine. There are no parts in the tub to cause wear and tear, or to wrench off buttons either.

The swinging, reversible wringer works electrically; the entire cost of running the 1900 is only a few cents an hour. When you think of the 1900, remember that magic figure 8! You can buy a 1900 Washer on deferred payments and have the use of it several weeks on approval before you pay any money; or even commit yourself positively to buying it. We believe you will like it so well that you'll not want to part with it afterwards.

The water swirls through the clothes in a figure 8 motion four times as often as in the ordinary washer.

Recipes for Devilling

By MARY M. NEIL

THE word devilling sounds startling, but in the cook's realm is simple enough. The word "to devil" means to make something hot with red pepper, mustard, chutney, etc. All sorts of things may be devilled, chops, toast, eggs, fish, cooked chicken, meat, and bones. As regards the latter, be sure there is something on the bones.

Devilled Bones.—The bones most used for devilling are from the shoulder or leg of lamb. Score the meat left on the bones with a sharp knife, and rub in the following mixture: Warm together one teaspoonful of made mustard, one tablespoonful of Worcestershire sauce, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one teaspoonful of salt, and red pepper and paprika to taste. Then grill the bones. They require a fierce, hot, and clear fire and cook until well browned. Serve hot.

Devilled Kidneys.—Four sheep's kidneys, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chopped onion, red pepper, salt, one teaspoonful of chutney, a squeeze of lemon juice, one-half teaspoonful of made mustard, one-half cupful of stock or water, two yolks of eggs and a few fine bread crumbs. Split the kidneys and cut them in small pieces, removing the white centre and the skin. Melt the butter in a saucepan, put in the onion and cook it a few minutes without allowing it to take color. Then add the kidneys with the seasonings; mix well over the fire and pour in the stock, cover and cook over a moderate fire for fifteen minutes. Draw the pan to the side of the range and stir in the yolks of eggs. Fill small fireproof dishes or scallop shells with this mixture, sprinkle with the bread crumbs, and pour over a little melted butter. Place in the oven and brown quickly. Serve very hot.

Devilled Chicken Croustades.—Make the croustades of pastry, and bake them until nicely browned. Cut one-half cupful of cooked chicken and two tablespoonfuls of cooked ham in fine shreds, or chop them. Heat them in a saucepan with two tablespoonfuls of stock or gravy, add one teaspoonful of chopped onion, one-half teaspoonful of curry powder or paste, seasoning to taste, and a little chopped chutney. Fill the pastry cases with this mixture, put a thin slice of pimento or tomato on the top of each, and place them in the oven until thoroughly hot. Garnish with small sprigs of parsley.

To make the croustades of pastry.—Take some plain pastry without sugar, roll it out thinly, and stamp out rounds with a cutter. Grease small round tins, and line them with the pastry. Prick the pastry at the bottom, line the tins with a little paper, fill them with dry rice, and bake in a moderate oven until brown and cooked. Remove the paper and the rice, and if necessary return the cases to the oven to dry the insides. The rice may be used over and over for the same purpose.

Devilled Drumsticks.—These are legs of fowl, turkey, or game. Peel and chop one small onion, and fry it in two tablespoonfuls of butter, add one teaspoonful of curry powder, mustard to taste, and two cupfuls of brown stock, cook for a few minutes, then add one tablespoonful of flour moistened with a little water or stock. Cook until smooth, put in the drumsticks, and heat right through (about forty minutes), serve hot. Another method.—Marinate the legs of fowl, turkey, or game in made mustard and oil for fifteen minutes, then grill them until nicely browned, and pour melted butter over them before serving. Serve hot.

Devilled Macaroni.—Boil in boiling salted water for twenty minutes one-half package of macaroni, drain well, cut it in small pieces and put it in well buttered fireproof dishes. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in a saucepan, add one tablespoonful of flour and when blended stir in one and one-half cupfuls of milk and cook until smooth, then add one-half teaspoonful of made mustard, one teaspoonful of onion juice, a saltspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika and a few drops of tabasco sauce, cook for a few minutes and pour over the macaroni. Sprinkle the top with bread crumbs, dot with small pieces of butter and bake in the oven until nicely browned. Serve hot in the dishes. Spaghetti may be served in the same way.

Devils On Horseback.—Prepare and fillet some sardines, and cut some very thin slices of fat bacon. Season the fillets with pepper, paprika and lemon juice, and wrap each one in a strip of bacon, enclosing a small piece of devil butter. Fix the rolls with a tiny wooden skewer, place them on oval-shaped pieces of hot buttered toast, which have been sprinkled with salt and pepper, and place in a hot oven until the bacon is ready. Serve very hot. Small pieces of cooked chicken or game liver are also very tasty done in this way.

To make the devil butter.—Pound one-half cupful of butter with a little curry powder or paste, one-half teaspoonful of chopped chutney, a squeeze of lemon juice and red pepper to taste.

Another method for Devils on Horseback.—Make in the same way as above, rolling a cooked and stoned prune inside of the bacon instead of the sardine. The prunes must be tender without being too soft, and they must be well drained from their liquid.

Devilled Eggs.—Boil the eggs for twenty minutes, then dip them into cold water, and shell them. Halve the eggs, and remove the yolks. Mash the yolks of eggs in a bowl, add one tablespoonful of melted butter, one-half teaspoonful of anchovy essence, a pinch of salt and a few grains of red pepper. Stuff the white halves of the eggs with this and cook gently till very hot. Serve hot on hot buttered or fried toast. This makes a good supper dish.

Devilled Sardines.—Scrape free from skin and oil, and wipe the sardines in a clean cloth. Then roll them in a mixture of made mustard, four tablespoonfuls of melted butter, Worcestershire sauce and a few grains of red pepper. Lay each sardine on a slice of toast in the oven, and serve very hot. It should not take more than five minutes to cook them in a very quick oven.

Devilled Duck.—The remains of a cold roast duck are suitable for a most excellent "devil." To make it you must remove the bones and cut the meat into rather small pieces, but not too small. Put into a saucepan one tablespoonful of dry mustard, one teaspoonful of salt, a few grains of red pepper, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, and two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice. Mix these ingredients gradually and very thoroughly together, add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, and three tablespoonfuls of water. When this gets hot, put in the pieces of duck and one cupful of white stock. Place the saucepan over the fire and stir it carefully till smoking hot, then turn it on to a hot serving dish, and serve as hot as possible.

Devilled Lobster.—Devilled lobster is one of the things that can be made with canned lobster. You must first prepare a paste of salt, dry mustard, curry powder, black pepper, and salad oil. Spread it over with lobster, then melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a fireproof dish, put in the fish, and heat it well through, browning the top.

Another method.—For this, fry small squares or rounds of bread. Chop the lobster. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add the lobster, one teaspoonful of made mustard, one tablespoonful each of chutney and bread crumbs, and one teaspoonful of vinegar. Make this mixture hot, and pile on the fried bread. Heat in the oven, and serve sprinkled with chopped parsley.

Devilled Biscuits.—These are done either dry or buttered. Dip soda crackers twice into warm water, then pepper them with red pepper, and bake till quite crisp in a moderate oven. Serve hot in a toast-rack.

In the other way, knead together three tablespoonfuls of butter, a saltspoonful of red pepper, and a saltspoonful of mustard. Dip the crackers twice into warm milk, spread them with the mixture, and bake in a moderate oven till crisp. Serve very hot on hot plates.

"Just Look What's Coming!"

If you ask the children, "What do you think is nicest for dessert?" you will get the answer: "Ice cream and Jell-O," or "Jell-O and ice cream."

It doesn't matter that the two are not at all alike. Either satisfies the craving for something that "touches the spot."

Ask the mother upon whom devolves the work of preparing the dessert which of the two she would choose for the children, and she will say: "I prefer Jell-O for the children, for they like it as well as ice cream, and it is better for them as a general thing."

In homes of wealth and culture, where the children's diet is carefully selected, and in homes where mothers with equal care prepare the food for the whole family, the favorite dish for the young folks is

JELL-O

There seems to be nothing else that so completely fills every requirement of a perfect dessert for children and grown-ups alike as Jell-O does.

It can be made into a surprisingly great variety of forms for dinners, luncheons and afternoon teas. The most bewitching things which Jell-O "demonstrators" show in their exhibits of food shows and the department stores can be made in perfection by any housewife—even by the young bride who cannot cook.

Just now Jell-O salads are especially popular. Dainty individual salads and entrees are moulded in teacups, small moulds or anything available for the purpose. To the housewife who has wished a hundred times that her salads might be made to look good as well as taste good, the Jell-O way is a revelation.

The new Jell-O Book, just out, describes new things in Jell-O: Beauty salads and plain ones—whips, knickknacks and dainties of almost unlimited variety. Recipes for every-day salads and desserts are given first place in it, of course, and particularly the new things in fruity Jell-O desserts. It is the finest of Jell-O books. A copy will be sent to you free if you will send us your name and address.

Jell-O is put up in seven flavors: Raspberry, Strawberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Vanilla, Chocolate. To be had at any grocer's or any general store.

The flavors are pure fruit flavors, of course, and the full strength of the flavors is preserved by the air-tight waxed-paper "Safety Bags" enclosing Jell-O inside the carton.

stone, beside which were yellow temple flowers in blossom. Here in a crevice of a huge square block the wind dropped the bit of paper, and this time it was Sepaya who reached it first. She lifted it, but dropped it again at once. In the crevice of the stone lay a pearl, such a pearl as the children had never seen before, large and lustrous, with a faint flush of pink beneath its light cloud-grey.

"I am sure it was an evil spirit—I am sure it was a Nat," said Sepaya, "None other could have hidden the temple jewels away like this."

"It was a Nat," agreed Nyo, soberly, and he plucked a yellow temple-flower and placed it on the spot where the pearl had lain.

While Nyo was putting away the pearl in company with the topaz, Sepaya looked about in search of their tinsel butterfly. But the wind found it first, and as the bit of gilt fluttered high, Nyo called out excitedly:

"Come down, O, bright one, come down, thou finder of bright things, that we may follow thee again."

There was a little grove of tamarind trees not far ahead.

Here the wind let its golden traveller rest a while, and the children found it lying in the grasses. The children saw its golden-yellow, but they saw more, for beside the tinsel lay what seemed to be a bit from a rainbow. The colors changed each moment, as if what held them was a living flame.

"I will carry it," said Nyo, "We will bring the great opal back to the temple with the other jewels."

"I just knew it was a Nat," said Sepaya, shaking her head solemnly, and the two children hurried from the grove lest the evil spirit come back to where it had hidden the opal.

The wind hurried too, and, swooping down, parted the grasses, snatched the bit of tinsel, and bore it in front of Nyo and Sepaya. They did not need to follow far, for the piece of gilt fluttered down right in front of them.

THERE it lay in the full sunlight, a blaze of blood-red light.

It was Nyo who spoke first: "We have found it, Sepaya, we have found the greatest of the lost treasures. It is the Heart of Ananda. We must go back at once. We will not chase our tinsel butterfly longer."

But little Sepaya picked up the bit of gilt paper to add to her treasures, and the two children, Nyo carrying the ruby in his hand, went back to the temple.

As they came into sight, Mee Poo trumpeted loudly, but the children passed on and up to the entrance of the pagoda itself. There they came to priests of the temple, and with an eager hand Nyo spread the four lost jewels before astonished eyes. The topaz, the pearl, the opal and the ruby, had returned to their temple.

With strange chant and slow step, the priests bore the treasures into the temple, the ruby, Heart of Ananda, most reverently of all.

At the entrance the children waited, and one of the priests, returning, poured into Nyo's and Sepaya's hands both gold and silver until they could hold no more. And all the time Mee Poo watched from the courtyard gate, his mind still full of honey-eakes.

"It was the tinsel paper found them all," said little Sepaya as the two walked slowly homeward. At each side of the avenue the toddy-palms shook their feathered heads, and Nyo looked up at the waving fronds, and said:

"No, little one, it was the wind that found them all—the summer wind—The Finger of Ananda searching for his own."

High above their heads the wind stirred the palm trees, and to the children it was singing:

A sunbeam is a golden guide to glories of the day,
The moon and stars will light for you the beauties of the night:
But follow me a-dancing, at hide-and-seek we'll play,
And I will find the treasures close hidden from your sight.

Two On the Trail

looked around at the grim, empty woods, and at the strange, alien boys who were to conduct them; and instinctively put out her hand to Garth.

The eldest and smartest of the breeds was a beady-eyed youth answering to the name Pake. When the "Aurora" passed out of sight his demeanor changed. It was not that he became openly insolent, but what was harder for Garth to deal with, he was blandly and blankly indifferent to the whites. Garth inwardly fumed, and there was a heavy weight of anxiety, too, for Natalie. Pake constructed packing harness out of rope, and divided all their goods into five lots, of which four were of about equal weight, and the fifth lighter. This one Garth supposed was for Natalie, though he thought it too heavy, but to his astonishment he learned Pake intended the light pack for himself, and one of the others for Natalie. Upon Garth's vigorous objections, Pake coolly added the greater part of Natalie's load to Garth's.

Hampered as he was by his augmented pack, Garth still managed to carry his rifle across his arm. And yet St. Paul, who interpreted for him, had assured him these were good boys and would treat him well. St. Paul was right, when Garth had been in the country longer he learned this was simply the breed way.

Whatever Natalie thought of their situation, she put on a bold air. As they started Indian file, under the great trees in the gathering dusk, the three swarthy youths in advance bowed under their packs: "Look!" she cried. "Isn't it like the frontispiece to a book of adventure!"

The breeds inherit from the red side of the house a shuffling half-trot, produced with heavy shoulders and rolling hips, that is a good deal faster than it looks. Natalie with her tiny bundle had much ado to keep up, and Garth under his, plodded doggedly behind, with breaking neck and shoulders.

After several miles of this, without warning, the breeds simultaneously cast their packs on the ground, and took a rest. Every move these strange creatures made was unexpected. Garth laboriously ridding himself of his burden, proceeded to read them a severe lecture on the necessity of accommodating their pace to the lady's for the rest of the way. It was received with stolid, uncomprehending stares.

Presently they set off again as fast as ever, whereupon Garth did as he should have done at first, lost his temper, and swore at them roundly. Pake looked around with a gleam of awakened intelligence, and slackened his pace. After a brief consultation, Pake and another set off in advance with their share of the goods, leaving the third boy to guide the feeble steps of the two moon-i-yas. Garth wondered if they would ever see Pake and the boxes again.

It was a long seven miles; and absolute darkness clothed the lofty aisles of the pine trees long before they finished passing through; and beyond there were interminable, misty meadows of wild grass to be crossed. Garth could no longer distinguish any sign of a trail; but the breed bent steadily ahead.

At last a bright light flared suddenly across the hay marsh; and from their guide's joyful exclamation, they gathered that it marked the end of their journey.

Five tepees, faintly phosphorescent with interior fires, stood in a line where the pine trees bounded the hay marsh. Garth's mind was relieved to find Pake waiting with the balance of the outfit intact. The fire they had seen was from an armful of brush lighted for a beacon to guide them. The people were all within. The three breed boys dived into the principal tepee without ceremony, leaving Garth and Natalie standing rather foolishly outside. They were evidently expected to follow; for presently a head was stuck inquiringly outside; and what they took for an invitation to enter was delivered in Cree.

"Let us go in," whispered Natalie. "I'm crazy to see what it's like!"

Without more ado, she lifted the flap which covered the entrance, and crawled, blinking, into the light Garth close at her heels.

A fire was built on the ground in the centre of the tepee; and the smoke, filling the apex, finally found itself out at the top. Around the fire was grouped a motley, gipsy crew of all ages; the elders in the place of honor above the fire; the children by the door. The firelight threw the copper-colored faces into strong relief; each wore an expression of stolid expectation. Like mongrels generally, their manners were bad; a grunt served for welcome, and places were coolly pointed out where they should sit.

With that the guests were forthwith yielded up to discussion, while the whole circle stared at them as if they were vegetables. In especial, the children sitting across the fire, transfixed them with eyes, under each mop of raven hair, as hard, bright and unwinking as the eyes of little birds of prey. Young Pake sat at the right hand of the principal man—a personage in frayed overalls and cotton shirt, with a scarlet handkerchief about his temples—and called attention to the points of the two moon-i-yas like their showman. After all the elders had partaken of tea, somebody recollected to thrust the battered pot at Garth and Natalie, with two more than doubtful tin cups. They declined to partake.

Garth was fuming. "Let's get out," he whispered.

"Just a minute," Natalie begged, with bright eyes. "Never mind their manners. It's all so strange and different!"

Presently the preparations for retiring, which their arrival had probably interrupted, were resumed. Hideously dirty and torn comforters with protruding cotton filling, were spread on the ground; and individuals began to roll up, feet to the fire. A woman indicated a place for Garth and Natalie, side by side. When her meaning became clear, they elaborately avoided each other's eyes, and Natalie beat a hasty retreat outside. She never again expressed a wish to enter a tepee. Garth, blushing to the roots of his hair, explained that they preferred to sleep outside.

Garth pitched the little tent he had for Natalie under the pine trees at a short distance, and spread her bed on balsam boughs inside, with tender hands. Natalie had suddenly half collapsed like a sleepy child. She disappeared with a murmured good-night, and was heard of no more until morning. Garth spread his own bed under the stars, athwart the door of the tent. He remembered before turning in, that they lacked water, and returned to the tepee to ask where it was to be procured. As he entered the second time, his attention was arrested by the sound of Mary Co-que-wasa's name on Pake's lips.

"Who is Mary Co-que-wasa?" he asked, recollecting his previous uneasiness.

It appeared they could understand English well enough when they had a mind to.

"Mary Co-que-wasa—one—bad—woman," said one, with the toneless enunciation of a parrot.

Another volunteered further information in Cree, in which the names of Mary and Nick Grylls were coupled.

"What's that?" demanded the startled Garth.

"Mary Co-que-wasa—Nick Grylls' woman," said his first informant.

That was all he could get out of them. It did not conduce to the ease of his first bed in the wilderness.

IN the morning Natalie issued forth radiant; and Garth marvelled afresh at the vision of urban perfection she made in the wilderness. He was blowing the fire at the time; a typical tenderfoot's fire, all tinder and no fuel, at which the breeds grinned askance. He soon learned better. The breeds haunted their camp, enjoying their struggles with that superior, insulting grin. Natalie, rolling up her sleeves, announced her intention of cooking the breakfast, while Garth struck camp. She who had never cooked under the best of conditions, had a sad time of it balancing a frying pan on a fire of twigs, and keeping the water in the pot long enough for it to come to a boil. They were sad-looking lumps of bacon that she offered Garth, burnt withal, and she gravely informed him there was a small slice of her thumb cooked up with it. The cocoa, too, which obstinately refused to dissolve in a cold element, was watery and full of lumps. However, they still had civilized bread and butter and Garth would have eaten Paris green with gusto, if offered with the same appealing smile.

Afterward an ancient box wagon came rattling up, drawn by two champing cayuses, guided by Pake, the "wise guy" of the bush. The duffle was thrown in; Pake and one of his brethren coolly pre-empted the box, allowing Garth and Natalie to dispose themselves as they chose among the freight; and they set off at a smart pace across the gloriously sunny meadow.

It was rough enough in all conscience; and in spite of every effort to brace themselves in the body of the wagon, they were shaken about like corn in a hopper. But in the bush it was worse; there, though their pace necessarily slackened, what with the holes, roots, stumps and fallen trunks, they had seldom more than two wheels on the ground; and more than once all that stood between them and a total capsize was Pake's dexterous wrist. Progress was so slow, Garth decided they might venture to insure their necks by walking.

So he and Natalie strode on ahead, pausing here and there to pick the delicious acrid mooseberries, and discussing their problems. Their talk was chiefly of Nick Grylls. Natalie finally confessed what had happened at the Landing.

"You should have told me immediately," Garth said with a frown.

Natalie looked "poor," as she called it. "I was afraid you'd send me home," she said. "Now you can't," she added provokingly.

Garth in turn told her what he had learned the night before.

"Look here," said Natalie frankly; "what is the use of hiding these things from each other? Let us promise to tell everything that happens after this. You wanted me to take you for granted as if I were a man. You treat me like a man and I will."

Garth smiled; and promised to try—just as she had done on a similar occasion.

"I wish I had some men's clothes," said Natalie stoutly; frowning as girls always do, when they see themselves in that character. And in the very act of wishing it, she forgot; and drove home her femininity. Tipping a palmful of mooseberries into her mouth. "Wouldn't I look nice!" she said with a sidewise sparkle.

Garth, swallowing a sigh, smiled, and allowed that she would.

They speculated on what Mary Coque-wasa's errand might be; neither of them was experienced in villainy. There, in the matter-of-fact daylight, and, as Natalie said, on Sunday, August the fifth now, it was impossible for the thought of one silent old woman to cause them much uneasiness; besides, they presently expected to join forces with the Bishop's ample party. Nothing nearly so simple and devilish as the actual truth occurred to them; and it was brought home with the force of a blow, when they reached the Warehouse.

About eleven, a final descent brought them to the shore of a demure little river flowing softly between high banks—Musquasepi, that they were to know so well. Off to the left it merged into the muddier waters of the "big" river. On the further shore stood the Warehouse they had heard of so often.

"Oh!" said Natalie. "Only another little log shack! Why I imagined a—"

"Five-story stone front?" suggested Garth.

"Well, I don't know," she said, "but not that!"

On the hither side was a solitary cabin; and in the doorway stood a breed, outwardly a different pattern from any they had seen—but after all not so different. He was clad in decent Sunday blacks minus the coat; and wore heavily-rimmed spectacles which he took off when he really wished to see. On the table within was ostentatiously spread an open Bible—the sharp-eyed Natalie took note that it was upside down. This young man had a heavy expression of conscious responsibility, before which the insouciant Pake visibly quailed. Pake indicated to Garth that Ancose Mackey stood before him.

"Where is the Bishop?" Garth demanded impatiently.

Ancose blandly ignored the question for the present. "How-do-you-do, sir," he said, like a mechanical doll, at the same time politely extending his hand.

Garth, shaking it hastily, repeated his question—but the young man was not to be hurried over any of his self-pleasing formalities.

"How-do-you-do, sir," he repeated to Natalie in precisely the same tone, gravely shaking hands with her.

Then they must needs come in and sit down, while their host made a remark on the weather, and informed them, with an air, that he was a very good reader. He wrapped his Bible in an end of comforter, and pulling a doll's trunk from under the bed, put it away. Natalie had a glimpse of the contents of the trunk; she said afterward, it was like the inside of his head; beside the Bible, there were sundry pieces of dried moose meat, a gaudy silk handkerchief, tobacco and a brass watch-chain of the size of a small cable. He took out the latter and put it on.

Finally he appeared to hear Garth's question. "Bishop gone up little river. Four days," he said.

"Some one was to meet me here," said Garth confidently.

An expression of genuine concern appeared under Ancose Mackey's solemn mugging. "You Garth Pevensy?" he asked.

Garth nodded.

Ancose's English was not equal to the situation. He turned quickly to Pake, squatting in the doorway, and exploded in Cree. Pake answered in kind. It takes a roundabout course to say anything of an abstract nature in Cree. Finally Garth heard the ominous name of Mary Coque-wasa enter into their discourse.

"What is it?" he demanded impatiently.

Ancose turned a long face to him. "Bad medicine here," he said. "Bishop send ol' Pierre Toma down from head of rapids with him team to get you," he went on, struggling manfully with his English. "Ol' Pierre stay to me three days of waiting. Las' night come boy up big river in canoe. Boy say to ol' Pierre, Cap'n Jack stuck at Caliper Island. Boy say, Cap'n Jack want tell to Bishop, Garth Pevensy no can come. Garth Pevensy him gone back outside."

Garth and Natalie looked at each other in dismay.

"Mary Coque-wasa do this," added Ancose. "Him no speak never true."

"Of course!" said Natalie. "She knew they wouldn't believe her, so she sent the boy up, while she waited below."

"Where's the boy?" Garth demanded.

Ancose shrugged. "Gone down," he said. "No can catch now."

"When did Pierre Toma go back?"

"Early," said Ancose. "Five hours. Him horses fresh."

"Maybe we can catch them yet!" cried Garth. "How much to the head of the rapids, Pake?"

Pake had ample English to make a good bargain. However, it was finally struck; and cutting Ancose Mackey's elaborate adieux very short, they took to the road again.

They had twenty-five miles to cover. This part of the trail is considerably used in freighting goods around the rapids, and in the North it is considered a good road, though the travellers' bones bore testimony to the contrary for several succeeding days.

BERTHA E. GREEN

MY Dear Club Members:
I opened a letter from Althea McLean of Westmount, Quebec, and, among other interesting things, she says:

"The splendid thing about our club is that it brings those who live so far away from each other into touch, and makes them feel that they have friends all over the Dominion."

This is one of the main objects of our club. Our club is purely Canadian, too, and our page is the medium by which our members can voice their hopes and ambitions. A contribution that is not a prize-winner is not a lost effort—not to our members—it only brings a realization that some other member has given a little more care to the subject. This friendly rivalry means essays of a higher standard and still greater enjoyment for those who read the winning ones when they are published.

A delightful Valentine story is this from our friend, Vera A. Johnson of North Battleford, Saskatchewan. The story within the story is told by a

I have a Valentine story from you, Andrew C. Johnson, but, Andrew, it was not nearly long enough. You could have told us far more about Saint Valentine, I know. Do not be afraid of taking up too much space next time.

Your essay is most interesting in that you tell us much about Saint Valentine himself, and why a day is set apart to keep his memory with us. I would like to hear from you again, in our next contest if you can compete.

Catherine M. MacKinnon, Truro, Nova Scotia, has sent us "My First Pair of Skates," a charming little story of kindly thoughts, and, what is more, of kindly deeds.

Please write me often, Catherine. I like to hear from you.

There is another "Valentine" here, this one from Elsie Lebreton. Kind thoughts and kind words always bring happiness, and in this story, the thought that prompted Alice to send a Valentine brought joy that she had never even dreamed of.

charming old lady to her grandchildren, of a valentine which she received from "the Major," who became so much better known to the children as "grandfather."

Yours was a truly admirable story, Vera, and, though not the prize-winner, is certainly worthy of honorable mention.

"My Valentine Gift," is here from Stella Silverstein, a splendid name for a splendid story, a story which leaves the reader happy, because of the happy ending of the story itself.

You have improved greatly in your composition, Stella, and I look forward to receiving your next essay.

"How Mary Won a Friend," is told in Elsie Gee's "Valentine story." If every Valentine were a "good luck" one such as you tell us of, Elsie, how easy it would be to make people happy. But the true kindness that is the keynote of your story is ours to use for the happiness of others.

When the Children out-grow Childhood

After all home pictures mean the most. Pictures of travel, of the week-end motor trip and of our sports—all these add to the fascination of the picture album. But the home pictures—for the most part pictures of the children, just every day pictures—these are the ones that never lose their appeal, that grow more and more in value as the children out-grow childhood.

And with a Kodak or Brownie such pictures are simple—and inexpensive. The No. 2A Brownie, with which our illustration was made, sells for four dollars and ninety-one cents. The Kodak Portrait Attachment, which is simply an extra lens that can be instantly attached or detached, provides for making "close ups." As its name implies it is for making portraits rather than views and it costs but seventy-five cents. A six exposure 2A Brownie film is thirty cents.

at every interruption of her progress took the occasion, in spite of Natalie's paddle, to turn about and stick her nose stupidly into the mud of the bank. Every bush in turn offered a different and more complicated obstacle than the last; in three hours they made perhaps twice three hundred yards. Natalie, alarmed by the spectacle of Garth's set lips, and the swollen veins of his temples, besought him for goodness' sake to swear and not mind her.

He finally decided to change his mode of going; and contriving a second little paddle, he embarked with Natalie. They progressed but slowly against the current; for the short paddles had about the same effectiveness as two of those little instruments for making butter pats, which they strongly resembled. Garth figured they would be making a mile an hour—but this way was easier on his temper.

To-day, the delicate, heady air of the Northern summer inspired their veins like wine. As Olympians, they lunched on the greensward carpeting the bank of a little inlet; while their shallop floated among tiny white lilies at their feet.

They loved; their happy eyes confessed it freely, though their tongues were tied. Nothing needed to be explained, for they were perfectly attuned to each other; and everything was clear in an exchange of eyes. The tough old world, with all its tiresome, grimy businesses was thrust out of sight and out of mind, and they seemed to tread a brand-new sphere, created as they would have it, empty of all save their two selfish selves.

As long as the sun shone they maintained their light-hearted gaiety, neither remembering nor desiring anything more—

"I say, Nat!" it would be, "toss me over the hatchet like a good chap. Hey, there! not at my head!"

"What's for supper, Nat? I'm hungry as an ogre!"

"Bacon aux tomates a la Bland and bannock Musquasepi avec ashes!"

"Bully! If you taste it so much there won't be any left, to go on the table."

"Where's the bag of hard-tack, Garth?"

"Grub-box number two; port side by the rail."

"Idiot! You put them on the bottom of the box! The water's leaked through, and they're all mush underneath!"

"What's the diff? Stick the soft ones in the lob-scouse!"

But after supper, when the sun had gone down, and the great stillness crept over them again, Natalie's arms dropped at her sides, Garth's pipe went out, and an unaccountable sadness fell on both. Then, their sporadic attempts to keep up the old, friendly rattle rang so false that both fell silent. Their camp of itself had a gloomy aspect. It was pitched in an elbow of the river, where a section of the cut-bank had sunk down, making a little terrace of grass a few feet above the water. Above, there had been a small grove of trees, through which a fire had some time swept, leaving only a few slender, charred trunks pointing askew against the slow, dusky crimson of the west. On the nearest and tallest of these wrecked monuments, immediately above their camp, as on a slender pedestal, sat a great owl, the only visible living thing in all the wide expanse, besides themselves. As long as there was light enough to see him, he crouched there, motionless.

Natalie sat huddled on a box, with Garth's coat thrown about her shoulders. Her chin was in her palm, and her lashes veiled rebellious, miserable eyes. There are moments when the most aerial spirits sink to earth; and just now Natalie could make no pretense at a flight. It was clear he loved her, as she loved him; what then were a few words five years old, to keep them apart? She tried honestly to arm her breast by thinking of the laws that separated them; but the insidious part of it was, they were worldly laws; and here the world was thrust out of sight. And Garth—seeing her sitting there so small under his coat, and all relaxed and appealing, her mouth like an unhappy child's, and her eyes big with unshed tears—his arms ached to enfold her; his brain reeled with the intensity of his desire to take her as she trembled to be taken. But her helplessness, which tortured him, nerved him to endure the torture. In the turmoil of his blood he could not think coherently; but he could repeat to himself, dully, over and over: "I must take care of her! I must take care of her!"

Natalie disappeared within her tent—and cried herself to sleep. Garth, lying outside the door, though she attempted to smother the sound in her pillow, heard; and it was like little knives hacking in his breast. Sleep for him was out of the question; he was denied the relief of tears. He rose, when Natalie's quiet breathing told him she was asleep at last, and undressing, waded into the river, and swam back and forth until the cold water chilled him through. Erisk, silent exercise restored his circulation, and a pipe and communion with the stars quieted his nerves. In the end he toppled over all standing, and slept on the grass until daylight.

Natalie reappeared with the sun, brave and rosy again, and with little sign of the night's tumult, save in an added sense of gratitude toward Garth, which appeared in the pleasure she took in doing little things for him.

To-day the character of the river changed little; only that the bends multiplied and sharpened; and where they were horseshoe curves yesterday, to-day they were hair-pin curves. Sometimes, just over the bank, they would catch sight again of a peculiarly marked tree they had passed a whole laborious hour before. Endless and futile were the calculations they made as to how far they had gone, and had yet to go.

They cut across from point to point, keeping under the bank out of the strength of the current as far as possible, and rounding the inside of each bend. In this manner they were ascending close under a willow bush, when suddenly and silently a huge, brown wing, like the wing of Sinbad's auk, sailed athwart the sky. They caught their breaths in astonishment. A great gray galley swept around the bend, no more than two oars' length from them. With her swarthy crew standing about the deck, their brows bound with bright silk handkerchiefs, and at the tiller, a great, bearded figure, she was the very picture of a pirate craft. It would be impossible to state which crew was the more surprised at the unexpected encounter; the seeming pirates likewise stared open-mouthed at the "Flat-iron." Just as the galley was disappearing, Garth collected presence of mind sufficient to hail, and inquire the distance to the lake.

The answer came back: "Twenty-five miles!"

The wind had changed; and puffy, white clouds came rolling up from the west, passing beneath the serene and silky streamers of the upper air. Gradually the invaders thickened and spread over the field; their underbodies took on a grayish tint; and the blue openings narrowed. Finally a sharp shower descended; and the voyageurs sought shelter under a bush, where they hung, watching the millions of drops plopping roundly into the surface of the river; each drop with its attendant sprite leaping at its approach. One shower followed another, with intervals of hot and sticky sunshine between. It was more uncomfortable under the streamy, dripping bushes than in the thick of it; and they finally decided to paddle ahead, let it rain as it would. Luncheon, consisting of soaked bannock and cold cocoa, was a sorry affair.

Garth was glum. He had long apprehended that bad weather would treble their difficulties. "How can I keep her warm and dry throughout the night?" was his ever-present thought. Natalie, on the other hand, was as happy as a lark; and she made a very attractive picture in the rain. Her dress had altered little by little during the last few days; and now comprised a blue sweater, short skirt and moccasins. The hat with the green wings was safely

The Proper Care of Children's Hair

How to keep it Beautiful, Healthy and Luxuriant

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THE beauty of your child's hair depends upon the care you give it.

Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes their hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your child's hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because the hair has not been shampooed properly.

When the hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While children's hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating mothers use Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your child's hair look, just

Follow This Simple Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water.

Then apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger-tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

When you have done this, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly, using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified.

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water. When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can, finish by rubbing it with a turkish towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified Shampoo, you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want your child to always be remembered for its beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo.

This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A four-ounce bottle should last for months.

Teach Your Boy to Shampoo His Hair Regularly

IT may be hard to get a boy to shampoo his hair regularly, but it's mighty important that he does so.

His hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your boy in the habit of shampooing his hair regularly once each week. A boy's hair being short, it will only take a few minutes' time. Simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub it vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when he is through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of his hair, and you will be teaching your boy a habit he will appreciate in after-life, for a luxurious head of hair is something every man feels mighty proud of.

WATKINS
MULSIFIED
COCONUT OIL SHAMPOO

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair; but sometimes the third is necessary. You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water. The strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

The nursing mother

HEALTH weaves a fairy charm about babyhood. It touches the starlike eyes with fresh beauty; it is the essence of that whiff of baby-sweetness that rises from the warm little bundle; it is the sole inspiration of those gurgly little noises born in the tiny throat.

With a keen yearning for baby's welfare, the wise mother watches her own health. She knows that her physical condition registers its effect upon baby through the milk.

Particularly is she careful to secure regular and thorough elimination of intestinal contents. Such waste, accumulating and allowed to remain in the body, creates dangerous and irritating poisons. These poisons are absorbed by the blood, carried through the body, and infect those cells which provide milk for baby's nourishment.

Leading medical authorities prescribe Nujol for constipation, particularly for the nursing mother, as it cannot be absorbed by the system, and, therefore, can not affect the milk. It does not upset the stomach. It does not cause nausea or griping, nor interfere with the day's work or play.

Nujol can also be given to the infant with perfect safety and effectiveness.

Nujol works on an entirely new principle. Instead of forcing or irritating the system, it simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system.

Nujol thus prevents constipation because it helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation—the healthiest habit in the world.

Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. Try it.

INFORMATION ABOUT NERVES.

Ontario, December 2, 1920.

"Dear Family Physician,—

"I was very interested in your page, so I thought it would be all right to tell you what I think about it. I was glad to read your very interesting page as one needs a little real English talk on the subject of health in the home, and one is not apt to have five cents for unneccessaries these days and so it is real nice to get free what one needs in any way."

Thank you. That is just what the Family Physician was going to say next, namely, that no "Information About Nerves" would be complete without pointing out how much people need encouragement. We all need encouragement from others, and therefore the kind reader who wrote the above letter to the Family Physician has not only helped, but has furnished us all with a good example of human. It is one of the attributes of humanity to be kind. So let us all encourage each other and say a kind word, even when you find it hard to say anything, or when you feel like saying something sharp.

Be Kind.

It is wonderful how much better it makes you feel right away just to have said something kind. And let us produce a smile even when it costs us something, and don't ever sit at the table two minutes without saying something pleasant. It assists digestion. I mean your own digestion, as well as the digestion of the other people at the table.

Encourage Yourself.

What's more, you must be able to encourage yourself. "Brethren, don't let's be too hard on ourselves," said the next point in regard to "Nerves." Cheerfulness is the bright weather of the heart and Sunshine in the home—shining all the time from Mother's face and Mother's heart.

Sunshine.

Sunshine in the home, brought in every time the husband returns, and Sunshine in the home, from the nice baby who pats the Mother's cheek and says "Never mind" in his baby way, when he thinks something must be wrong, is one of the best preventives of nerves.

People who are not kind, and especially people who are unkind in their own homes, are rather less than a clergyman once at a meeting. It was good advice. There are people who never have a good word for anybody, not even for themselves, and while no one admires the boaster, that is quite a different thing from the encourager. Quietly make up your mind what's right for you to do and do it, and then don't allow yourself to be depressed by the events of life. You are doing your best, and if you can do better, then the minute you see how to do better you will do it. So cheer up, and remember that as people get older they are more easily depressed; therefore always have the younger generation about you. Julius Caesar said: "Let me have fat men about me

WE were speaking of women's organizations and what they are doing when someone said: "It's curious how seldom you hear any complaint now-a-days, about the woman who belongs to a club. Years ago, it seemed to be taken for granted that a woman who joined any kind of club or society was straightway going to let her house and her family go to ruin. Now, a woman may join two or three organizations, in addition to her church societies and no one seems to think that her actions are out of the way."

"Just the same," said a judicious-looking matron, "I think we are trying to belong to a greater variety of societies than we are equal to. I believe we should do better work if we concentrated our efforts. It's trying to the nervous system, too, to keep up interest in half-a-dozen clubs. I am more convinced of this than ever since I dropped two clubs and have given all the time I could spare from home and church to the Woman's Canadian Club and the Women's Historical Society."

"And I find that the Women's Institute takes up all my outside energies," said a woman from Northern Ontario.

"My husband is a believer in clubs," said a quiet little woman in a grey gown. "You see, I joined a 'Current Events' Club two years ago and have enjoyed it ever so much. We took up Forest Conservation at one meeting and I became so interested in finding out about how we neglected our own more than we did ten years ago—and we hope that the old English comedies such as "She Stoops to Conquer," and "The School for Scandal," will not be utterly forgotten.

Of course, there are the movies, which we have always with us. They, however, do not take the place of local effort to produce well-trying plays and operas, and we believe that we shall gain infinitely by an attempt to keep in mind and eye the productions which delighted another generation.

IT is to be noticed that no one of the once-Allied countries seems to feel towards Vienna the animosity that is naturally aroused by the mention of Berlin. Austria, according to the impressions of most of us, was the tool of Prussia and was not willingly the foe of the British Empire. Consequently, now that the war is over and the pitiful plight of the city, for many years the medical capital of Europe, is revealed, the heart of the world is touched to a show of practical sympathy. Hundreds of Canadian medical students had regarded a tour of Europe incomplete without a course at Vienna,—and many doctors throughout the Dominion recall their student days in the Austrian capital as a busy and bright period in their professional training. A Canadian doctor who had received many kindnesses during his sojourn in the Austrian city years ago, recalling a certain officer who had been foremost among his friends, wrote to him twelve months since, to wonderful woods, that I realized, for the first time, just how great our heritage is and how little some of us prize it."

As we looked at the face of the little woman in grey, we remembered that her youngest boy was one of those who fell at St. Julien in 1915, and we understood why it was important that she should become "interested" in many things.

"I'm a believer in the club," she continued, "it helps to broaden us—and to make us sympathize with the lives of others—and their work."

NOW that the winter sports and parties are upon us, some of us would like to ask if the old-time private theatricals or the production of well-known operas by local companies could not be revived? They mean so much in the social and artistic life of the community and afford an exhibition such as few other forms of entertainment can give. There is, for instance, the town of Strathroy in Western Ontario, where for some years a local organization has given productions of Gilbert and Sullivan operas, or similar works. Who ever grows tired of "The Mikado," or "The Pirates of Penzance"? The brilliant melodies and sparkling humor of the Gilbert and Sullivan productions are more welcome than ever in these years of after-the-war discomfort. We need music and really buoyant humor find out the true conditions in Vienna. So deplorable was the state of his old friend that the Canadian hastened to send aid, both in dollars and food. The gratitude of the stricken household was pathetic and the relief was great. However, the strain was so severe that the father of the household died, leaving his wife with three young daughters, to face the further horrors of "After-the-War."

Further aid has recently been sent and the letter of the eldest daughter reveals a condition of affairs truly lamentable. Vienna, in common with other capitals, has a class of "new rich," those who in various ways made money during the war. These citizens are utterly selfish and are busy supplying themselves with luxuries, while the true Viennese are on the verge of starvation. Even one tin of condensed milk is received with joy by the family of the middle class, which finds modern prices beyond its reach. The bread is most inferior and is extremely high in price, while meat is an undreamed-of luxury for most of the citizens. Truly, the aftermath of war means desolation for the women and children, those who are poorly equipped for the struggle. This young girl, Valerie—of Vienna—is teaching English, Latin and French while she pursues her own studies. May a brighter day come for sorrow-laden Vienna.

My Dear, I Made Every Stitch of It Myself—

"I'm so proud of my success that I just have to tell everybody about it," said Mrs. Ramsey, displaying the charmingly dainty frock to her neighbor. "Isn't it a dear?"

"But how did you manage the fitting?" asked the friendly neighbor with sudden interest. "That always prevents me from even the attempt to make any of my own clothes."

"Well, it was this way," continued Mrs. Ramsey. "With both the boys and their father in service and little money coming in, the question of clothes was a serious one. When I could afford money for dress material I could not afford a dressmaker, and vice versa. Both Helen and I needed new clothes. Her school dresses were so shabby I was ashamed. One day I had a letter from my sister in Regina, telling about 'Susy'—that's what the family named her Queen Adjustable Form, she said she and 'Susy' had made all the clothes for herself and the girls, and what a wonderful saving it had been. She actually saved enough to buy her winter's coal. I knew Jessie would never write me about the saving value of an Adjustable Form if it wasn't true, because she is the most economical person in the world. So I decided right then to send for one, and my dear, I've been so glad I did. I made Helen a lovely warm school dress and several house dresses, all our aprons, and even our petticoats."

"You know Helen is so hard to fit because of her bad hip. Poor child, she is so sensitive about it, too—"

"But how could you fit both yourself and Helen on the same form?" interrupted Mrs. Neighbour.

"That's the splendid part of it—I simply adjusted the form to the measurement of Helen's hip and then changed it to fit my own. We think it quite a wonderful invention. And if you only knew the blessed relief of not standing for hours to be fitted—The Queen Adjustable does all the torturous standing. I wouldn't part with it for anything. It's paid for itself a dozen times over."

wrapped in the duffle-bag; and hither-to she had gone bareheaded on the river. When it began to rain she pulled a man's cap close over her head to keep her hair dry. As she industriously plied her paddle in the bow, ever and anon turning a rosy, streaming face to him, with a joke on her lips, in her rough get-up poor Garth thought her lovelier than ever. He was continually having to call himself down, as he would have said, for presuming to think he had measured the extent of her charm.

"Isn't it bully, Garth?" once she cried. "Ever since I was a baby I have longed to be allowed to play in the rain for just once, and get as wet as I possibly could—just to see how it felt! And now I shall! Isn't it funny just to sit and let it come down, without running anywhere? Women are babies, anyway. I mean never to put up an umbrella again as long as I live. The rain feels good in my face!"

Nevertheless, Garth, occupied as he was with the problems of how to find a dry place to put up the tent, and how to build a fire in a downpour, was anxious. Little by little the showers merged into each other; and before the end of the afternoon, it had settled down to rain steadily all night.

He learned in the end never to trust the distances given in an unmeasured land. Rounding one of the endless bends toward five o'clock, they became aware of a new indefinable, fresher smell on the air and they increased their pace with an eager sense of a discovery awaiting them in the next vista. The next point proved to be the last: looking around it, the wind buffeted their faces fresh and cool; the river stretched away for half a mile, straight as a canal and there, away beyond, leapt the waves of Caribou Lake on the bar.

Natalie cheered. "Hooray for the crew of the 'Flat-iron!'" she cried. "We've actually done it!" She reached back. "Shake, partner!"

Near the head of the river, in the wild waste of sand on the lake shore, squatted a weather-beaten little log cabin, almost eave-deep behind the dunes. Smoke arose from the chimney. "Good!" cried Garth in high satisfaction. "You can dry your clothes here, anyway."

A glance up and down the shore of the river revealed no trace of the canoes or the outfit of the expedition they were in pursuit of.

"We've missed him again," said Garth grimly.

They landed, dripping and stiff; and plodded through the sand to the tiny door. The outlook was desolate in the extreme; there was no sign of life anywhere, save only the wisp of smoke from the chimney. At their left hand, the lake spread bleakly to the horizon, torn and white under the west wind, and with great billows tumbling on the beach.

"The 'Flat-iron' could never negotiate that," remarked Garth.

He knocked on the little door.

"Come in!" rang instantly from within.

"An English voice!" she whispered. "A white man! Thank God!" said he.

CHAPTER IX.

THE HEART OF A BOY.

IT was a youth who presently faced them on the threshold of the hut: an apple-cheeked boy of seventeen, who bared two rows of shining white teeth; and whose blue eyes, at the sight of them, sparkled with the purest enthusiasm of welcome.

"Come right in, and dry out!" he cried. "I certainly am glad to see you!" The haunting reed of boyhood still vibrated faintly in the manlier notes of his voice.

Here was a greeting from a stranger to warm the hearts of the wet and weary wayfarers! It presented the North in a new aspect. Natalie in especial, beamed on their young host; he was wholly a boy after her own heart.

Looking at Natalie more particularly, the boy blushed and faltered a little. "It isn't much of a place to receive a lady in," he said apologetically. "I haven't been on my own long enough to get anything much together."

It was a characteristically boyish abode. The furniture was limited to the cook-stove in the centre of the room; and a home-made table and a bench. His bed was spread on straw in one corner; and another corner was given up to the heterogeneous assortment of his belongings and his grub. Apparently the cabin had long served as a casual storehouse to the boatmen of the river; for pieces of mouldy sails were hung over the rafters; oars and a mast crossed from beam to beam; and in a third corner were a pile of chain and an anchor, slowly mouldering into rust. In wet weather, the present tenant evidently did his chopping within doors, the floor was littered with chips and broken wood. As they came in, a yellow and white kitten, retreating to the darkest corner of the cabin, elevated his back and growled threateningly.

"That's my partner, Musq'oosis," explained the boy. "He'll make friends directly. He plays with me by the hour; you'd laugh yourself sick to see the comical way he carries on. He's great company when you're batching alone!"

Natalie liked this boy more and more.

"Say, I'm having no end of company these days," he went on, with his happy-go-lucky air. "The Bishop's outfit was here all day yesterday; they went up on the last of the east wind, this morning. The old woman—that's what we call Mrs. Bishop, you know; no disrespect—she baked me a batch of her bread before she went. Real outside bread with a crackly crust to it! Oh my! Oh my!—with brown sugar! Say, we'll have a loaf of it for supper!"

Natalie in the meantime sat on the bench; and taking off her moccasins, put her feet on the oven sill to dry. Garth sat on a box; and their host squatted on the floor between.

"By the way," said this youth; "I'm Charley Landrum."

Garth introduced himself and Natalie.

"Hope you'll stay a couple of days," said Charley anxiously—"or longer. There's great duck-shooting on the sloughs; and we might get a goose or a wavy around the lake shore. It would be a pleasant change of meat for the lady."

Charley addressed all his remarks to Garth, without ever once looking at Natalie; it was clear, nevertheless, that he was acutely conscious of her presence for he blushed whenever she spoke; and his eyes were continually drawn to her, though he dared not raise them quite to her face. To Garth and Natalie the nicest thing about this boy was the way he took her presence for granted. Of all the males they had met in the North, he alone had not gaped at her in vulgar wonder; and to his honest heart there was nothing out-of-the-way in the fact that she was Miss Bland, and Garth, Mr. Pevensey.

"We're obliged to get on as soon as we can," said Garth. "We've been chasing the Bishop all the way from the Landing."

"How did you come up the little river?" asked Charley.

"I bought a boat from Pierre Toma." "I know her," he said with a chuckle; "cranky as a bath-tub! You couldn't go up the lake in her!"

"Not while it blows like this," said Garth.

"Then I hope it hits it up for a week!" said Charley, apparently addressing the hem of Natalie's skirt.

"I was told one Wall-eye Macgregor had a strong boat," Garth said.

"Nothing doing!" returned the boy. "He's got it up at the head of the lake."

"Then I must try to strengthen the bath-tub and coast around the shore," said Garth.

"I'll help you!" said Charley. "We'll pitch in first thing to-morrow."

"How long have you been in the country, Mr. Landrum?" asked Natalie softly.

The boy blushed for pure pleasure; and his voice deepened as he replied: "Two years next March, Miss. I came in over the ice with a freighter. I ran away from school. What was the use?—I've got a head like a hickory nut; and I couldn't keep out of trouble. They gave me a bad name; and everything that happened was put on to me. So I cleared out and came North."

Gradually the whole naive, boyish tale came out.

"I had a lot of fool ideas about the country then; but they were soon knocked out of me. All the kids that run away soon come sneaking home and have to eat their brags; and I wasn't going to do that. So I stuck it out. At first I admit I pretty near caved in with home-sickness; but I'm hardened now. The first year I worked for a trader up at Ostachegan creek; and this spring I bought this cabin on credit. Frank Shefford up at Nine-Mile-Point is going to lend me his team and mower when his hay is put up; and I'll put up hay myself."

The boy's eyes glowed, as he announced his brave plans for the future.

"Next winter I'm going to keep a stopping-house for freighters. I've got a good location here, and stable room already for eight teams. I'll build it later. There's money in that; and it's a pleasant life for a man—plenty of company. And when I get a little money ahead, I'll trade; there's good chances for a free trader that knows the ropes; and in a few years I'll branch out and have a whole string of trading posts, like Nick Grylls. There's a smart one! They say he could sell out for a hundred thousand any day!"

"I hope you won't be like Nick Grylls," said Natalie gently.

"Don't you like him?" asked Charley in concern. "I always thought he was a pretty smart one. No!" he added suddenly. "I don't like him either. He's coarse!"

Supper was an affair of joint contributions; Garth's jam for Charley's bread. In the meantime Charley had surreptitiously swept up the chips; and had then slipped away to the river bank, for a wash and a tidy-up. He reappeared with his hair well "slicked," his tip-tilted nose as pink as his shiny cheeks, and a smile that extended to the furthest confines of his face. But he was distressed that he had no white collar to honor the board; and his gratitude was silent and boundless, when Garth produced one for him from his duffle-bag.

It was a jovial meal that followed; the spirit of youth presided; and wisdom and grave speech were thrust under the table. Charley recovered of his bashfulness so far that he could occasionally nerve himself to look at Natalie. For all the boy's giddy jollity, his blue eyes had a kind of stricken look when they rested on her face. But his appetite did not suffer appreciably; and it did Garth's and Natalie's hearts good to see the bread and jam disappear between Charley's business-like jaws. Jam, they agreed, had surely never before been so successful in tickling the human palate. "Just do without it for a couple of years and see for yourself," Charley rejoined.

Afterward the cabin was further swept and garnished for Natalie's use; and a heap of fragrant hay brought from the stable on which to spread her blankets. The house was to be yielded up to her for the night. Garth and Charley shared the little tent outside. Garth, with his simplicity, and his air of quiet understanding, was above all one to win a boy's confidence; and by bedtime they were as friendly as brothers—or perhaps more like a very young father and his oldest son.

When they rolled up side by side in their blankets Charley seemed to put off several years. He hunched closer to his bedfellow; and pressed his shoulder warmly against Garth's.

"Are you sleepy?" he asked diffidently. Garth's heart warmed to the act and the speech. "Why, no!" he said. "Believe I'll have another smoke before dropping off. Fire away, old boy!"

"Say, it's simply great to have somebody young to talk to," said poor Charley. "Somebody that understands; and that you can let yourself go with, and say whatever comes into your head to. Say, I never had such a good time in all my life as to night. All the fellows up here—they're a good sort all right—but they're a rough, cursing, lot. And of course, a fellow has to curse too; and talk big just to keep his end up—chuck a bluff, you know, or they'll think you're a molly. And I just love to laugh, and get foolish and I always have to hold myself in. Sometimes I near bust!"

"I get like that myself," said Garth encouragingly.

There was something else on Charley's mind but for a long time his tongue sheered off at every approach to it. Finally, rolling over, he hid a hot cheek on Garth's shoulder and it came out with a rush.

"Say! I think she's the prettiest girl I ever laid eyes on!"

Garth's arm tightened about the boy's shoulders.

"She's the first white girl I've seen in nearly two years," he floundered on; "and girls meant nothing to me then. But I know darned well she's no ordinary white girl. Isn't it wonderful, the different ways she looks; and all that her voice seems to mean besides the words she says; and the way she walks and sits down; and the way she lifts her arm? Isn't it a pretty arm? And the finest thing about her is, she deals plain with you like a fellow; no silly fuss and make-believe, and hanging-back about her!"

If Garth liked the boy before, he was prepared to love him for this.

"Did you mark how she called me Mr. Landrum?" continued Charley eagerly. "She just did that to please me, I know. Didn't it sound funny? My chest expanded two inches, I swear it did. Wasn't she kind to me? She had no call to be so kind to me. It just makes me want to do something terrific! Oh, if I could only do something for her!—wouldn't I just be glad of the chance!"

He was silent for a while, tossing uneasily in his blanket. "Say, there's something I want to tell you," he blurted out at last. "I'm certainly good and ashamed of myself! There's a girl down the shore, her name is Julia; she's not a bad-looker for a breed. She came around my cabin sometimes. I was kind of lonesome, you see; and she was young, like me—"

Garth let him see that he understood—and he did understand, both the pitiful little tale, and the boy's reason for wishing to tell him.

"And to think of her asleep in there now!" he continued remorsefully. "It makes me sick and disgusted with myself. I'd give anything if it hadn't happened! You bet I'll have no truck with them in future!"

"Every man makes mistakes, old boy," said Garth.

Charley, his mind relieved by confession, in the midst of further rhapsodies, suddenly fell asleep.

In the morning he awoke all of a piece, as boys do, and rolling over, said instantly:

"Natalie is sure the prettiest name there is!"

LATER in the day in the middle of their somewhat hopeless deliberations upon the repairing of the half-submerged "Flat-iron"—her flimsily hung planks had been started even by her gentle journey on the river—there was a hail from down-stream. Looking, they saw four swart figures bending one after another in a tracking-harness, crawling around the edge of the cut-bank below. Presently a sharp prow nosed around the bend; and a long, low, double-ended galley swung into view, floating lazily on the current like a gigantic duck.

"A York boat!" cried Charley in surprise. "Didn't know any was due! Here's your chance to cross the lake!"

"H'm!" said Garth doubtfully. "We'll find out, first, what news she brings from below."

At the sight of the open water ahead, the breeds redoubled their shouting, and hit up their pace. It was interesting to see how, once having got her under way, they could allow nothing to stop them; but needs must crash through obstructions regardless; slipping, scrambling, literally clawing their way along. Whenever the rope caught, it was the part of the fourth man to slip out of his collar, and disengage it, without stopping the others. It was racking work on the frame of a man; but the leather-headed breeds ceaselessly chattered and shouted, like boys out of school; roaring with laughter when one of the four came down. In the stern stood the helmsman, pulling her head around, with a mighty sweep, extending astern; and the other four of the crew, resting from their spell of tracking, fended her off the bank with poles. The York boat, pointed bow and stern, low amidships, and undecked, reminded Garth of the pictures he had seen of ancient Norse galleys.

Arriving opposite the cabin, they all leaped aboard; and poling across, landed in front of where Garth and Charley stood. Natalie, not caring to run the gauntlet of another battery of stupid stares, had retired to the cabin. On the prow of the boat, which had a dingy, weather-beaten look, very different from the smart green and white craft of the "Company," was crookedly painted the name "Loseis." Making her fast, the breeds, with furtive stares at Garth, threw themselves on the ground like tired dogs. It was not long, however, before a "stick-kettle," the invariable tom-tom, was produced, the ear-splitting chant raised, and a game of met-o-wan, a sort of Cree equivalent for Billy-Billy-who's-got-the-button, started on the shore.

The steersman, pausing only to put on a gold-embroidered waistcoat, approached Garth with a disposition to be friendly—too friendly by half, Garth thought. He was an undersized man of not more than thirty, but already somewhat withered; a specimen of the unwholesome, weedy breed of the settlements.

"Well, Charley," he said affably.

They shook hands with the touch of impressiveness that always marks this ceremony in the North; and then Hooliam, with a shifty glance, extended his hand to Garth. At the same time he said something in Cree.

"He says: 'You want to go up the lake,'" translated Charley.

"How does he know that?" asked Garth quickly.

Hooliam answered in Cree without waiting for Charley to translate. Evidently, like most of the breeds, he understood more English than he cared to confess.

"He says that Pierre Toma told him," said Charley.

"Ask him how it is he comes up with such a small load," suggested Garth.

Charley repeated the question in Cree. Hooliam's answer was prompt and glib. "He says that the water was too low to bring a full load," translated Charley.

"Ask him when he means to go on," said Garth.

Hooliam gave a glance at the still tossing lake. "As soon as the wind dies or changes. This wind would blow him right back on the shore," such the gist of his answer by way of Charley.

"Tell him to let me know before he starts; and I'll tell him if we wish to go along," said Garth coolly.

"I want to have a talk with you," he added in a lower tone for Charley's benefit.

They sat down apart on the sand.

"What do you think of this outfit, Charley?" asked Garth.

The boy was surprised at the question. "Well," he said, "it does look a bit queer, their coming all this way with half a load. But you never can tell about these crazy niggers; they may have dumped out half their stuff on the bank somewhere, and left it to rot. A French range for the inspector has been lying on the point across the river for two months."

"Who is this Hooliam?" Garth asked. "He boats back and forth pretty regular. He's a footless kind of breed—but straight, as far as I know. What do you care?" the boy asked curiously. "If he takes you on board, he's got to put you across."

Garth looked at Charley estimatingly. But there could be no doubt of the boy's straight-eyed, whole-souled devotion to Natalie; and he quickly made up his mind. He told him briefly what had occurred on the way in.

Charley whistled in astonishment. "So that's the kind Nick Grylls is!" he exclaimed. "He sure must have gone clean daft!"

"This Hooliam," Garth continued, "is too anxious, judging by others of his kind to get out on board. I suspect Nick Grylls has a share in this outfit. On the other hand we have less than a week's grub left. What have you got, Charley?"

"Nothing but sow losom and beans," said the boy disconsolately; "and damn little of that! It isn't good enough for her!"

"Any chance of another boat?" asked Garth.

Mrs. Knox's Corner

A Winter Fruit Season

I WONDER how many of us, when we are trying to think of something different to serve, overlook the delights offered in dried fruits—apples, peaches, apricots, and even our old friend, the prune.

When fresh fruit is scarce, I have found that the most delightful and wholesome surprise desserts may easily be made at small cost, with Knox Gelatine and dried fruits. Try these two tempting recipes.

APRICOT CREAM PUDDING

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/2 cup cold water 1/4 cup sugar
1 cup cooked apricots and juice
1 table-spoon lemon juice 1 egg white

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve by standing cup containing mixture in hot water. Put apricots and juice through a sieve, add lemon juice and strain into this the gelatine. Add sugar and when dissolved set bowl in pan of ice water and stir until mixture begins to thicken; add egg white beaten until stiff. Turn into wet mold or ordinary dish, garnished if desired with cut apricots and chill. Any dried or canned fruit may be used in place of the apricots.

To make a "twice-as-high" more creamy, won't dry out being add one teaspoon Knox Gelatine, softened in cold water and dissolved over hot water to your favorite icing recipe. Beat in well before spreading on cake.

PRUNE ORIENTAL CREAM

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/4 cup cold water 1/3 cup chopped nuts
1/4 cup scalded milk or toasted cake
1/2 cup sugar crumbs
2/3 cup cooked prunes 2 egg whites

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in scalded milk and add sugar. Strain into bowl containing ice water and beat constantly until mixture begins to thicken; then add prunes, chopped nuts or toasted cake crumbs, and egg whites beaten until stiff. Turn into a cold mold the bottom and sides of which are garnished with halves of cooked prunes; then chill. Serve cold, with plain cream, whipped cream or custard sauce.

Evaporated milk may be whipped up into a delicious whipped cream if a teaspoonful of Knox Gelatine softened in cold water and dissolved over hot water is added, whipping the milk in a bowl surrounded by ice or ice water.

There are many other winter desserts as well as salads, meat and fish molds or relishes given in my booklets, "Dainty Desserts," and "Food Economy." Send for them, enclosing 4c in stamps, to cover postage and mention your grocer's name.

A Home-Made Gray Hair Remedy

You can prepare a simple mixture at home that will gradually darken gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. To a half pint of water add 1 ounce of bay rum, a small box of Orlex Compound and 1/4 ounce of glycerine.

These ingredients can be bought at any drug store at little cost, or the druggist will put it up for you. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. This will make a gray-haired person look many years younger. It is easy to use, does not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.

French Ivory Products.

A. F., Jordan, Ontario:—For some reason which we are unable to explain the proprietors of French Ivory Products, Limited, of Toronto, have failed to reply to inquiries sent them as to what position their business might be in. We have, therefore, gone into the matter from a different angle. It appears that Mrs. O. G. Smith is president of the company. The company was incorporated with an original share capital of $40,000 in 1919. The original name, which was The Smith D'Entremont Company, Limited, was changed to that of French Ivory Products, Limited, and the capital increased from $40,000 to $150,000. The concern seems to be regarded more or less as a close corporation. That is to say, that very little stock has found its way into the hands of the general public. A statement as of October 5, 1920, shows that the company has on its books assets to the extent of $79,478, and liabilities totalling $42,620. This shows a surplus of $23,320. I understand that the company manufactures a high-grade celluloid goods for a special class of customers. The company appears to be in good standing, but as to what earnings are being made we are unable to speak. Perhaps if you write the company they may be able to tell you. At any rate, each Ontario company is supposed to hold an annual meeting, and to give a statement to shareholders, and you might ask the company for such a report.

Editor Concerning Investments:

Would you kindly give me your opinion in regard to Sterling Exchange from the following points:

(a) Do you think it will ever go back to $4.86 and be stationary as in pre-war days?

(b) Do you think that this will come about within the next two years?

J. J. F.

In answer to your first point, I do not see how one is warranted in assuming that as time passes the financial and commercial recovery of England will not bring the currency of that country back to its parity. As to the time element, that is quite another matter. I would think that two years is all too short a time in which to encompass the very desirable result indicated, supposing that from now on there are no fresh complications of any kind, arising either within the country, or from without, to cause further embarrassment. If any power or combination of powers sought to embroil England in another conflict, and forced the nation to take up arms once more, either to uphold a principle or to retain her present footing, the strain on her finances would be very great, and sterling exchange would weaken to a point probably lower than it has been. When we consider the prodigious waste of capital to which England has been obliged to submit during war, it is rather surprising that her currency is now in as high regard as it is. The position over there is that the nation has been obliged to issue paper money to finance war, to an extent which took her off the gold basis altogether, as one might say. She now has to crawl back. England has to compete with the other nations, in the process of accomplishing a production which must be very much greater than in pre-war days. In no other way can she put the necessary value behind her issued currency. One of the first indications, perhaps, that will mark the appreciation of the people of England of the fact that war prices and war wages are of the past, will be when the workers consent to work longer hours, and to have their pay shortened. The extraordinary productivity which is preached in England as being vital to her re-establishment, cannot very well ensue so long as the workers are trying to hold salaries and wages up to anything like the pre-war scale. I think it would be a very optimistic view indeed, that would suggest that sterling will rank at parity within two years from now.

Editor Concerning Investments:

Can you give me any information about a certain motion picture company in which I invested? The name of the company is the Canadian Photo Play Productions, Limited, and it was organized in 1919, with headquarters in Toronto. Since I invested I have heard several rumors that the company was on the rocks, as it were, and that the President, Harold J. Binney, had resigned. As I can find out nothing about them here in Montreal, as the company who handled the stock here, Roberts & Co., have gone out of business, I thought you might give me some information. The company who handled the stock in Toronto, when it first was issued, was the Photo Play Underwriters' Association, 413-414 C.P.R. Bldg., Toronto, but having written them and received no reply, I presume they either have moved or else gone out of business.

E. H.

Harold J. Binney was simply a motion-picture adventurer, who should never have been allowed to sell stock of any kind in Canada. He left Toronto suddenly after the foundation had been built for a so-called motion picture studio on the Toronto-to-Hamilton Highway. My impression is that your money is as good as gone because, while the company is still in existence, I doubt that they can continue to hold the property, paying out interest and taxes, for any extended period. I believe also that the studio itself is not well adapted for the kind of work for which it was to be erected. There is a mass of ruins on the site at the present time. I would advise you to write to the directors of the company for information as to what the financial condition of the company may be from the standpoint of the shareholder. There were a number of judgments filed against the company.

"A Valentine Party," was given this month by Grace Swayze: it is a real story of real boys and girls, of real fun, and real happiness. Let me hear from you again, Grace.

"How Mary Was Repaid," is a very pleasing Valentine story sent to me by Ivy Walker. Valentines often mean the keeping of friends, but this story tells of a Valentine which began friendship for more than one.

I like your stories, Ivy, and I think I can see your name among the prize-winners before long. Be clear and careful, that is quite as important as having a good subject about which to write.

Ellen Magnusson has sent me a story, "Dave's Valentine Dream." It is told with much interesting detail, and has a happy ending, brought by a Valentine.

One of our best stories is here in front of me. Velma Swick has sent it, and I wish to thank her personally for the quaint legend of Saint Valentine. And it ends: "So we hold Saint Valentine's Day as a day to be kind and gentle to everyone."

I am looking forward to your next contribution.

"Violet's Dream," a Valentine story by Kathleen Dawes, is the prize-winner. Congratulations, Kathleen, from us all.

Your story is a delight, and I am sure all the members will enjoy it.

I would like to review each story sent in, but this is hardly possible. But each month, from different contributions, I will try and publish extracts, so that the club may enjoy and benefit by reading each other's bright thoughts and ideas.

The "snap" you sent me, Diana de Ribcowsky, was a very pretty one, and I am wondering if you were the little girl standing at the crossing of the paths.

Your letter, and the snapshot of Duck's Bay, were both delightful, Daisy Bennett. I almost envy you your home on Manitoulin Island, for I, too, know and love the North country.

There will be many "indoor" days during the next month or two, good days to write those stored-up stories that are in your minds. Won't you write them to me? I feel sure you will.

Your sincere friend,

BERTHA E. GREEN.

VIOLET'S DREAM (A Valentine Story.)

"Oh, dear," grumbled Violet Redfurn, "I do wish we didn't live in this out-of-the-way place. I don't suppose I'll get a single Valentine today," and she flopped disconsolately into the hammock.

"Why, my dear," replied mother, "Why don't you take a walk in the woods, and see if you can't discover some of the birds mating?"

"Huh," came a half inaudible reply from the depths of the hammock cushions, "that's just a story, about birds mating on St. Valentine's Day."

Violet's father was a naturalist, which fact compelled him to live in the country; to which he brought his family.

The surroundings were very beautiful, and an early spring made February a warm month.

Violet soon fell asleep, in the hammock; and as she slept, she dreamt that a fairy came, and, taking her by the hand, led the way to the woods.

And such a twittering as you never heard, came from every tree. The place was alive with the music of the birds. On every branch was a row of birds, in twos or threes. With their heads to one side, they looked so sweet, that Violet wished she could pick them up, and hold them for a moment.

Two fat young robins were quarrelling over a cute little brown wren. In the thick of the argument, she flew away, to join one of her own kind, who was calling from a nearby tree. Violet nearly burst out laughing, to see the look of surprise on the robins' faces, when they turned to find their lady love gone.

Over all, sat the parent birds, watching the scenes, and wishing they could be so foolish again.

When Violet awoke, she remembered her dream, and never again called the "Legend of St. Valentine's," just a story.

MY FIRST PAIR OF SKATES.

ONE day in December, a cousin of my grandfather, came to visit us when I was six years old. He brought his skates because he was a fancy skater and could do all kinds of fancy "stunts." He stayed with us about a week and on Christmas Day my father gave my sister and me, each a pair of skates and boots our good old cousin had left us. They were hockey skates, for he knew, of course, that it was not so easy to learn on "spring skates."

The very next day I went skating. I took a broom to help me stand up, but "Tanks" (our dog) would chase me and nip my legs so that in my hurry to get away I would fall down and when I did manage to get up again, he would chase me and if I stopped to look around, he would bump into me with such force, it would send me sprawling on the ice. Of course, he was only a pup and was very playful. Other times, when I had just watched other people skating, it looked to me very difficult to stand up on skates and I found it even harder than it looked. I think about every two strokes I took, I fell down. And the broom would go flying from me so I would fall down three or four times getting to it, or I would crawl to it.

Then the second time I went out it was down in the swamp. This was, of course, in the afternoon, as I was too young to go out at night. This afternoon it was quite stormy and a fearful gale was blowing. My two sisters and some girls from the village were out, I could not stand up no matter how I tried, so I spent the remainder of the afternoon in being drawn around on a sleigh. I sometimes went out at night as I got older, to skate with the others and sometimes there would be forty or fifty people skating on a natural rink, in and out among the trees. Sometimes we would skate nine or more miles back in the swamp. There were some places, of course, that we were rather afraid to go for there were a number of quagmires in it. Then there was another swamp about a mile up the road that sometimes we went to. But we usually went down to the one near by.

Now I am twelve years old and it seems easier to skate than to walk.

Flora M. Sproule, age 12, Westbrook, Ont.

Charley shook his head. "No Company boat due for three weeks," he said.

Garth set his jaw. "Then there's no help for it," he said firmly. "We'll have to go with Hooliam. I'll make him take our little boat along, so we won't be entirely at his mercy; and I'll watch him close."

Charley leaned toward Garth. The boy unconsciously clenched his hands; and in the intensity of his eagerness, his eyes actually filled. "I say, Garth, take me along with you," he pleaded.

Garth, looking at him gratefully, thought none but a boy could be so generous. "But I can't take you away from your own work," he objected.

Charley brushed it impatiently out of sight. "What does that matter!" he exclaimed. "It can wait." He redoubled his pleadings. "This was what I wanted so badly, Garth! To be a little use to her! I could help—you think I'm just a crazy kid, and maybe I am, but I could think like a man, and plan like a man for her! You and I could stand watch and watch. Say, after what you've told me, I'd go near out of my head to see you two sail away, and me left behind, not knowing what was happening!"

Garth was more moved than he cared to show. "You're true blue, Charley," he said in a low tone. "You come along!"

CHAPTER X.

ON CARIBOU LAKE.

FROM sundown until daybreak, the Fki-yi-ing and the beating of the stick-kettle on the shore desecrated the stillness of the night with scarcely any intermission. Shortly after daybreak, the wind having gone down, Hooliam sent word to Garth that he would like to start.

They were ready in a few minutes. At the sight of Charley's bundle with the others, Hooliam scowled and muttered in Cree.

"Says he can't take me," said Charley. Garth flushed angrily. "This was all it needed," he burst out. "What reason does he give?"

"No reason," said Charley coolly. "Just talks foolish."

Hooliam added something with a great show of plausibility.

"Says he hasn't got room," said Charley with a laugh.

"Rubbish!" said Garth. "You tell him he takes the three of us or none! Give it to him strong!"

Upon receipt of this ultimatum, Hooliam, shrugging, turned away; and the three of them boarded the "Loseis."

Running out two pairs of clumsy sweeps, which were no more than good-sized trees a little flattened at one end, they laboriously pulled out of the river. Before them the lake stretched to the horizon as smooth and colorless as a lightly frosted pane. Loons, herons and a little kind of gull; ducks in pairs and squadrons; flocks of brown geese and shining white swans, wheeled, sailed and swam about them in countless numbers.

When they had rowed upward of a mile into the lake a mighty discussion suddenly arose amongst the crew. The oarsmen ceased their labors to take part in it. Eight wetted brown forefingers were held aloft.

"They're scrapping about whether there is any wind," Charley explained.

To a white man's senses there was no sign of wind; nevertheless the oars were run in, the cargo shifted, and the heavy mast, with infinite labor, stepped amidship and guyed. Hooliam looked on indifferently from the stern, idly swinging his great sweep back and forth. Finally a dirty square sail was raised. It declined to belly or flap in the slightest degree; but the breeds, satisfied with what they had done, lay around the boat, preparing to enjoy themselves in luxurious ease. They amused themselves by tempting the water-fowl close with imitations of their cries; and popping at them ineffectively with their twenty-two "trade-guns."

Garth stood it as long as he could. "Look here!" he said at length to Charley. "Ask him how long this is going to last."

Charley translated. Hooliam looked sagely astern, spat, and answered in Cree.

"He says there'll be a breeze by and by," said Charley.

The scarcely veiled insolence of this reply caused Garth inwardly to fume. However, reflecting that, after all, Hooliam ought to know more about navigation than he, he possessed his soul in patience for another half-hour. There was still no sign of wind; and it was growing very hot in the sun. Garth, setting his jaw, drew out his watch.

"Tell him I'll give him just fifteen minutes longer," he said quietly. "If we're not under way by that time, there's going to be trouble."

Hooliam received the message with apparent indifference. Garth held his watch in his hand. Three minutes before the expiration of the time, he had Charley convey a final warning to the breed. Hooliam suddenly became voluble and expostulatory.

"He says the boys won't work when there's a breeze coming up," said Charley.

"You tell him, then, that I will take command of this boat, and run her myself," said Garth.

At the last moment the orders were hastily given. The mast was reluctantly taken down, and hung over the side; the cargo was shifted back, and the sweeps run out. The breeds rowed half-heartedly, with furtive scowls for the moon-i-yas who made them work.

After a couple of hours during which they covered a scant three miles, a breeze did spring up from astern; whereupon the whole business of raising the mast was gone through with again. Little by little it freshened, and the "Loseis" began to forge ahead, making a pleasant little murmur under her forefoot. The hearts of the three passengers rose in unison.

But they had not sailed two miles more, when the exasperated Garth discovered that Hooliam was slyly edging his craft inside a point of the shore. At first the breed unblushingly denied any intention of stopping; but when it became apparent that he could not round the point without hauling down the sail, he coolly admitted that he was going to land.

"What for?" Garth demanded.

"They're going ashore to spell—to cook and eat," Charley explained. "Hooliam says there is no other place to land in fifteen miles."

Garth was obliged to be content.

With the characteristic prodigality of the breeds, an enormous fire was built on the shore, over which their tea was furiously boiled in an iron pail, and their dried moose meat stewed a little less tough than moccasins. At a little distance the three passengers made their own preparations for lunch.

Natalie, serenely trusting in Garth, put aside all anxiety about the outcome of their journey; and was frankly interested and amused.

"Mercy!" she exclaimed. "They'll all die of tannic poisoning! And look what they eat! The bacon is as green as arsenic!"

She proved to be using her eyes and ears to good advantage on the way.

"The tall boy," she said, "the one that looks like an actor; he's the humorist of the party. He keeps them in fits of laughter by giving moon-i-yas imitations. He mimics us to our very faces. Their idea of us is too funny! The good-looking little one is his inseparable friend; they hold hands when they're not working. The one with the whitey-blue eyes is called by a very blasphemous name. I watched him turning over the pages of some stove catalogues that dropped out of a crate, with such a serious air. And they were all exactly alike, but he didn't know it, because he held some of them upside down! What do you suppose he made of a picture of a self-feeder standing on its head?"

To Garth it seemed as if they took an interminable time to prepare and eat their simple meal; and afterward there could no longer be any doubt, from the way they loafed about, that they were soldiering, as a result of Hooliam's low-voiced encouragement. They grinned with childish impudence at the scowling moon-i-yas. At last Hooliam produced a pack of cards and a game of "jack-pot" was started on the shore.

This constituted frank defiance; and Garth took instant action.

"Put up those cards!" he commanded. The boys laughed and looked at Hooliam.

"Get on board the boat," Garth ordered, through Charley.

Hooliam's eyes bolted; but he made no move. With the sheer perversity of a child or a savage, he insisted there was no wind, even while the ripples were washing the stones at his feet.

Garth, thoroughly exasperated, picked up his rifle. His eyes glinted dangerously. "There's something behind this nonsense!" he cried. "And I'm going to stop it! You let him understand that if he opposes me any further I have eleven cartridges in the magazine of this rifle, and I would think as little of bringing him down as that wavy up there!"

A wild swan, most difficult of marks, was sailing high overhead. Garth, as he spoke, took aim and fired; and the great bird dropped like a plummet in the shallow water off shore.

Loud exclamations of admiration broke from the boys. Three of them dashed enthusiastically into the water to contend for the honor of bringing back the prize. Garth builded better than he knew. The boys, while scarcely understanding the threat, were instantly impressed with the successful shot; and with it Garth established himself once and for all in their eyes. They instinctively began to carry the things on board as he had ordered; and in the end the scowling Hooliam was obliged to follow them on board, or be left behind.

As they were getting under way again, Garth observed Hooliam busy with the sail. When it was hoisted, it appeared he had taken a reef in it.

"Shake it out!" Garth commanded.

Hooliam shrugged and protested.

"He says the mast is not strong," Charley translated. "This heavy wind will carry it away," he says.

"Just now he said there was no wind," Garth said. "Let her go; and if anything breaks we'll mend it."

Hooliam in a long harangue, demanded to know through Charley, if Garth would pay for the damage.

For answer Garth merely picked up his rifle; and the reef was let out in a hurry.

In all this there was something more than mere savage perversity; Hooliam, it was clear, had an urgent private reason for wishing to delay the journey. He had not sufficient command of his features to hide his chagrin at the failure of his several attempts. He sulked all afternoon. Garth sat with his weapon across his knees; and his steady gaze never wandered far from the steersman. Willy-nilly, Hooliam was compelled to hold the "Loseis" to her course; and by four o'clock, the wind holding light and steady, they had covered about thirty miles of their journey.

About this time the mast of another boat was discovered sticking above the bank of a creek on shore. The usual excited discussion arose—this time as to the identity of the craft. Finally the "Loseis's" prow was turned toward the shore. Garth demanded an explanation. Hooliam, more obsequious now, said that it was Phillippe's boat on the way out; and he had messages to deliver him from their common employers at the Landing. Garth suspected another excuse; but he was very reluctant to interfere with the real business of the North; and since it was almost time to spell for another meal, he decided to make no objections.

With true half-breed impetuosity they chose the worst place in miles on which to beach the "Loseis." Her forefoot was run on a bar fully two hundred yards off shore; and communications were carried on by means of laborious wading, waist-deep, to and fro. The moment she touched, the entire crew and the skipper, dropping everything, dashed pell mell for the beach and across the intervening sand to the camp of the other boatmen on the shore of the creek. The passengers ferried themselves ashore in the "Flat-iron," which had been stowed, much against Hooliam's will, on board the "Loseis."

After supper, as time passed and there was no sign of the returning crew, Garth sent Charley after Hooliam with a peremptory message. Hooliam returned, cap in hand, his whole attitude changed. He expressed a willingness to start immediately; but deprecatingly pointed out that a storm threatened; and apologized for the unseaworthy condition of the "Loseis." This time he had reason on his side; for angry clouds were heaped about the setting sun; and the orb itself was peering luridly between parted curtains of crimson rain. Garth, still suspecting him, was yet taken at a disadvantage. He thought of Natalie on board the shelterless "Loseis" in a rainstorm and finally announced his wish to remain where they were for the night. Hooliam smirked demurely, in ill-concealed satisfaction.

All returned to the "Loseis" for what was needed during the night. The preparations to secure the York boat against the threatening storm were highly characteristic of her hit-or-miss crew. A stake was driven in the sand of the lake bottom, at either side of the stern, and the rudder-post lashed between. This flimsy apparatus was designed to keep the boat from being driven broadside on the bar. The practical Garth frowned impatiently at its utter insufficiency; but the breeds could scarcely contain their impatience to resume their gambling with the other crew; and presently they dashed off, leaving the "Loseis" to her fate.

Garth pitched his camp under the shelter of a line of willows, marking the edge of higher ground along the wide waste of sand. The two crews with their ceaseless tom-tom on the shore of the creek, were upward of half a mile away. Natalie was made comfortable in her tent; and Garth and Charley, collecting a pile of firewood, covered it with a tarpaulin, against the coming rain. Charley, who had slept during the afternoon, was to watch until two o'clock; and Garth, covering himself with a piece of sail-cloth, lay down at the door of the tent.

It seemed to him he had no more than fallen asleep, when Charley shook his shoulder to awaken him.

"It's one o'clock," the boy said. "I think something has happened in the camp over there. They quieted down; but now they have started up again, and have built up their fire. Looks to me as if somebody had arrived. Thought I'd better wake you, while I sneaked over and took a look."

Charley was gone more than an hour. Returning, as soon as he had entered the circle of the firelight, Garth saw by his face that something important was in the wind.

"I was right," the boy said. "Nick Grylls has come. He arrived in a canoe with a breed; and sent him back. Nick and Hooliam went outside the camp, and talked by themselves. I listened from behind a willow bush. Nick Grylls knows a lot more Cree than I do, and I couldn't understand everything; but I got the gist of it. Nick was giving Hooliam hell all around—first for making him paddle all night—it seems Hooliam ought to have waited for him at that point where we spelled this morning—and then for bringing me. That was the sorest touch; for Nick knows I understand Cree. He said it upset all his plans."

"It was a mighty good thing for Natalie and me that we had you today!" Garth put in.

The boy blushed with pleasure.

"Go on," Garth said.

"Grylls was pretty mum about these plans of his," Charley continued. "I guess he only lets Hooliam know part. I caught just a word or two. One thing was clear; you are his mark. I made out there was to have been a row at the point, and you were to have been put out of business, so you couldn't keep on with this journey. Then Nick was to happen along as if by accident; you were to be sent to the half-breeds at Swan river to be taken care of, and Nick was going to do the friendly act, and help Natalie on her way. I bet she never would have got there! In some way Nick has learned all about Natalie; for he seems to know where she's going; and what for. Anyway, you put

BIAS FILLED CORSETS

*The Extreme of Comfort
The Perfection of Style*

A GRACEFUL FORM is every woman's rightful possession. Nature has endowed her with beauty of line which only a corset of proper construction can preserve. Improperly designed corsets cause the muscles to slacken, with a consequent enlargement of the waist and a sagging of the entire figure.

The "Bias Filled" principle is not an experiment. The test of time has proven it to be the scientifically correct method of corset construction.

Are You Hitting the Sunset Trail?

You are, if you have passed your fortieth birthday, for that is the half-way mark in life's span of years. Now is the time for special vigilance in regard to your health. Pyorrhea, which afflicts four out of five people over forty, may have established itself in your mouth.

Pyorrhea is a disease of the gums, but medical science proves that its germs invade the body and cause many of the ills of middle age. These germs may deplete vitality, or impair the functions of the heart and other organs, and often result in such ailments as rheumatism and anaemia.

Pyorrhea begins with tender and bleeding gums, then the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the infecting Pyorrhea germs which breed in little pockets about them.

To avoid Pyorrhea, visit your dentist regularly for tooth and gum inspection, and start using Forhan's For the Gums today.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices will not do this. Forhan's keeps the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions, and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment. 35c and 60c tubes in Canada and the United States. If your druggist cannot supply you, send price to us direct and we will mail tube postpaid.

IN SNOWTIME.

By BERTHA E. GREEN.

IF it had been the summertime, you would have seen children playing on the broad stretches of green under the shading trees. But it was in the winter, in February, in the middle of the morning of a blowy, snowy day so there were no children in the park.

There was someone there, however; and that one was a little cottontail rabbit, and his snuffly pink nose was cold.

He had left the shelter of the brush-piles and thickets of the ravine nearby, for he was on friendly terms with the squirrels who made their homes in the oak-trees throughout the park. But this morning Snuffler, the cottontail, was unlucky, either the squirrels' overcoats were not warm enough, or they had chores to do at home, for there was not a whisking grey or black tail to be seen.

He hopped cheerfully over to the oak-tree nearest him, and called loudly; but the wind scattered his words so that not one of them reached the squirrels' house.

So Snuffler brushed the snow off his nose, closed his eyes, and thought hard for a moment. Where was there any fun to be had?

He opened his eyes again, and, if you had been there right afterwards, you would have seen him bobbing across the park to where, on a little knoll, a flower-bed was set out each summer. From here he could see all over the park, and beyond it.

Again he was disappointed. Not even a sleigh, or a man, or even a dog, was inside the park gates. He wanted company, and was getting so lonesome that he had just about decided to go home and have a snooze, when a skiff of fine snow was swept into his face, and a chorus of mischievous, though cheery, voices sang all around him:

"Bye Baby Bunting,
Daddy's gone a-hunting,
To get a little rabbit-skin,
To wrap the Baby Bunting in."

Snuffler wasn't lonesome any more. When he had rubbed his eyes clear of snow, he saw just whom he expected to see—the whole flock of Snow Buntings, skipping, flying, and dancing around him as they sang.

"Serves you right, Snuffler, for coming out on such a blowy day. You might have known that we would catch you if you left your brush-pile."

Snuffler laughed, as he replied:

"You caught me, but it's such a cold, cold day that I can't let you have the little rabbit-skin to wrap the Baby Buntings in. There aren't any Baby Buntings in the winter, anyway, and, besides, you aren't all Daddy Buntings."

"But we really came a-hunting," chirruped the snow-birds. "Hunting for you, to tell you that, right by the little fir-tree near the park-gate, is a carrot."

"A what?" exclaimed Snuffler.

"An ever-so-big carrot, a really-truly-to-goodness carrot," they chorused. "You'd better hurry, Snuffler, before it flies away."

Did Snuffler hurry? All you could have seen of him would have been a bobbing, snowy whirl, above which circled and darted a flock of snow birds.

It was a beautiful big carrot, just the sort of a carrot he wanted; but how was he going to get it home to his brush pile?

"Why don't you roll it, Snuffler?" suggested the Snowbirds.

The Bunny tried, but it was very hard work.

But the little Buntings were not through helping Snuffler. If the wind could sweep the snow, so could they.

Up hill and down, across the park Snuffler rolled that carrot, leaving behind him a smooth path, which even the boisterous wind of February had some trouble in covering up again.

But Snuffler and the Snowbirds had been so busy working, that they had not noticed that their road led them to the foot of a short, though quite steep, hill. Half way up this hill Snuffler managed to roll his precious carrot, only to have it roll back again ten times as fast, with Snuffler himself sliding madly after it. Three times this happened; and at last Snuffler sat down on the carrot at the foot of the hill, wiped his forehead with the back of his paw, and grunted:

"I might as well not have had the carrot at all."

"Not a bit of it," chirruped the Buntings. "While there is a wiggle left, there is a way out. Come on, Snuffler. Over the hill to the brush-pile."

In a few minutes a strange sight might have been seen in the park. From the ravine thicket, a long, leafless, brown, grape-vine came sailing through the air, one end trailing on the snow. The Snowbirds were towing it. They fastened one end to the carrot, and, bringing the other end of their grape-vine rope around the trunk of a small tree on the hill-top, they told Snuffler to "haul away."

Everything went splendidly until the carrot was almost at the top of the slope. Then Snuffler's feet slipped from under him, and Snuffler, still hanging to the grape-vine, went up the slope on his back, passing the carrot on the way as it slid down again.

This did not happen any more, for all the Snowbirds clung to Snuffler's end of the grape-vine. The carrot was at the top of the hill, and was soon being rolled smoothly and easily down the slope, right to Snuffler's very own brush-pile.

When after much tugging, the carrot was safely stowed away, Snuffler came to the door of his brush-pile, and, calling to the Buntings, who were flying near, he said:

"I am sorry that I haven't got a nice, warm rabbit-skin to wrap up each and every one of you, but, if you'll only come around in the summertime, you'll find a place, right here, to build the nests for Baby Buntings, and their Daddies too."

We Will Come Back

used to tell), but never up that long trail came John Ainslie McNair. And the time came when my father found the farm over small for his growing lads, and so he pulled up stakes and moved us all to Ontario—moving to Canada, we called it, as if "the Island" were a land by itself.

"And the very day we left, the boat put off at our old landing-place, a stranger—a man of city clothes and speech; and he hailed an ancient man who knew him not, and him he asked, "Does old Malcolm McNair live here still?" And in his solemn way the ancient man did answer make:—

"They've all sailed for Canada." "And o'er that stranger's face a grey shade crept; "And Kitty McCrea?" he asked in choking voice.

"And when young Malcolm went, what for would Kitty McCrea no go?" the ancient said. "Old Malcolm, and the Missis, and the youngers, and Young Malcolm and Kitty McCrea, all sailed for Canada, the day's morn."

"And John Ainslie McNair, for it was he, turned on his heel and went away and was never heard of more."

As Catharine paused, her husband took up the tale; "And then," he said; "I stepped dramatically forward from my place behind your chair (for though I had met you but once or twice, I was already by way of keeping as close to you as propriety would allow), 'Never heard of more,' I repeated—'till now—Madam, behold John Ainslie McNair,' and I made what I flattered myself was a graceful bow. And the old lady's eyes almost popped out of her head. 'And if it isn't,' she cried—'his living image. And do look at Kitty, how like she grows to her Grandmother—my dear adopted sister, Kitty McCrea—and you, young man, must be the grandson of our long-lost brother—John Ainslie McNair.'"

The fire had dwindled to a mass of glowing coals; around the house the wind still howled.

"Oh, Jack, do you hear that shutter bang?—and the branch at the window, sounds like phantom fingers writing on a slate. 'The hand-writing on the wall,'" suddenly Catharine sat up straight and her eyes glittered with excitement.

"Jack, could it be? Did you feel it, too? A message for us from the soul of the old house—calling us back—or perhaps—perhaps from the spirit of John Ainslie McNair and Kitty McCrea, wandering disconsolate through space."

Her husband, tense at her side (for the mystic Highland strain was strong in him too), removed not his gaze from the fire, where strange visions came and went.

"Perhaps," he whispered, as one forced to speak, but fearing to break a spell—"Perhaps we are Kitty McCrea and John Ainslie come again to earth, and the message is from the spirit that guards the house of McNair, bidding us to come back, back to the old home, back to the simple life, ere our souls become atrophied by the sordid sound of money-getting, of social rivalry; our bodies worn out before their time by the hurry and rush of the West."

Suddenly, the wind fell and all the eerie sounds which had filled the house were stilled as if by magic—then a late sun beam glancing through the branches at the west window, came to rest on the couple before the fire; and Kitty McCrea McNair had her head on her husband's shoulder; and John Ainslie McNair had his arm around his wife's waist; while something of the love of their youth—perhaps of their many youths—came back to them there in the twilight of the old room—and—

"We will come back," she murmured, "our girl is a product of the west—western—she will stay, and the man she has chosen will carry on your work; and her children will follow the chimera of 'Furthest West.' But our boy—he is younger, he will be educated here, in the East, amid the old traditions (for we have traditions, we of Canada), and perhaps we can teach him some of the real truths of life—the things that are worth striving for; not money, not social supremacy; not power, not even happiness (for that comes seldom for the striving); but a quiet mind; to treat every man, and particularly every woman, well; to earn a living decently; to cultivate his mind, that always within himself shall he find companionship unailing; to follow the traditions of his Scottish ancestors (except in that one particular of roving); to do all this, that his soul may be at rest."

"We teach him all this that later on, 'he may depart from it,'" her husband added with a return to his usual cynicism. "Well, in any case," he went on, "we shall have done our part and earned our quiet minds; but assuredly, come what may—we will come back."

Health and the Home

and such as sleep o' nights. I like not lean and hungry Cassius." Very true, O Caesar! But chubby children are the best of all fat men and a sure cure for depression. Children are great encouragers. They have such confidence in us that it gives us strength to live up to their expectations.

Now don't forget that the six things that make the most difference to nerves are: Sleep, food, fresh air, exercise, useful work and encouragement.

Mind Your Meals.

Everything that affects the general health affects nerves. Constipation, for example, or indigestion would depress anybody. When people are hungry they are usually either irritable or depressed. Haven't you noticed how much better people feel after dinner. People who never eat enough or don't have the right kind of food are sure to have "nerves." Buy a good, sensible cook-book and study the menus and see if you cannot get some good hints about this. Are your family eating enough vegetables, for example? You don't serve potatoes at every meal, do you? Is the teapot always on the back of the stove, or do you drink tea at the proper time, not more than three minutes after it has been made? Tea that stews an hour or more on the back of the stove is poison for nerves, and strong tea is not good for anybody. Give the frying pan a rest. Don't have it on the stove in preparing every meal.

How many hours' sleep should you have? Nine.

They Win.

Do you need a walk every day in the fresh air? Of course you do. You must have it.

Remember that more people have been cured by the "Call of the Job" than were ever cured by thinking about themselves and their illnesses. Are you smiling? You ought to be. Did you smile at breakfast? I am glad you did.

Now "Get into the Game"—I hope you do not work too hard, but I do hope you have enough to do. Do not let yourself get too tired. Go to bed early. The game of life is such a good game that those who play it and keep the rules always win. What do they win? It would take a wiser man than the Family Physician to tell you that. But they win.

Two On the Trail

his scheme to the bad by winning over the boys; and he is hot.

He acted queer, too," Charley went on. "The first thing he asked was, if Natalie was well; and his voice sounded crying-like. Say, he's changed altogether from the hearty old sport, that used to travel through the country like a lord, handing out cigars. He's losing flesh. I think he's a bit touched."

When the boy finished, Garth took a turn, breathing deeply; and finally returning to the fire, sought that trusty counsellor, his pipe. "I'm glad he turned up," he said coolly. "This is more like fighting in the open. And thanks to you, I'm well warned."

He smoked a while in silence. "I suspect I'll have my work cut out for me to-morrow," he resumed reflectively. Presently he gripped Charley's shoulder, and searched the boy's face. "I'll be damn thankful to have you along, old fellow," he said. "But I don't think I have any right to let you in for this. This man is very powerful in the country; and he can spoil all your chances. You had better go back with Philippe. Neither Natalie nor I would ever blame you."

The boy turned away his head. "I—I can't talk about it," he faltered. "If you go on that way you'll have me crying like a girl! You could talk all night, and it wouldn't do any good! What do you think I am? I'm not going to miss the fun!"

Garth laughed. "Turn in," he said briefly. "You'll need all the sleep you can get."

CHAPTER XI.

THE FIGHT IN THE STORM.

GARTH and Natalie were wondering next morning with what kind of a face Nick Grylls would greet them. He was the last to come off to the boat. Hooliam took possession of the punt as a matter of course, to bring him aboard; but Garth, determined not to allow the slightest act of insolence to pass unchallenged to-day, curtly ordered it back; and the fat trader was obliged to wade out like the breeds, and scrambled over the side of the "Loseis"—a very undignified re-entrance upon the scene.

His demeanor was remarkable. All the way out from the shore he had probably been shaping the character in which he meant to make his bow. He threw a leg over the side of the boat, affecting all his old, blustering heartiness; but the sight of Natalie and Garth awaiting him, wholly self-possessed and unconcerned—they had determined in advance not to stoop to the pretense of any surprise at seeing him—pricked him like a blown bladder. His eyes bolted; he nodded at them askance; and he mumbled the words he had been intending to shout. Catching sight of Charley directly, he attempted to carry off his discomfiture by assuming an added boisterousness.

"Hello, Charley!" he cried. "What's the good word, boy?"

"Hello, Mr. Grylls," returned Charley with a demure grin, that was highly creditable to his powers of dissimulation. "Where did you drop from?"

Grylls guffawed with an overdone assumption of a man at his ease. "Oh, I got a sudden call up to the Settlement," he said, in a tone meant to reach Garth's ears. "Got a big deal on to sell out my posts on the Spirit. I overtook you folks last night; and sent my canoe back. Thought I might as well save money. Have a cigar?"

"Thanks," said Charley. The boy lighted it elaborately, and commended the quality with the air of a connoisseur.

"You're all right, kid!" cried Nick, clapping him on the back. "I tell you I'm blamed glad to have a white man to talk to on the way up"—this with a side glance at Garth. "What are you doing away from home at this season?"

"Grub running low," said Charley readily. "Had to go to the Settlement for a fresh supply."

"Well you go to Jonesy of the French outfit," bellowed Nick; "and tell him to give you my prices!"

Nick kept the boy at his side all day, flattering and cajoling him with an immense patronage, that, coming from the great man of the country, was meant to turn the head of this, the youngest of its settlers. In this Nick had a double purpose: he wished, of course, to secure the boy's interest to himself; but he also wished Garth and Natalie to see what a fine, generous fellow he could be when he got half a chance. There was a great deal of the child in the self-indulgent trader; and he had not lived among the breeds for twenty-five years without imbibing many of their characteristics. As to the boy, Garth and Natalie felt not a moment's uneasiness; Charley met Nick's advances with a kind of imitative bluster, that was a source of great secret delight to Natalie.

The day's journey was uneventful. Grylls kept himself forward of the mast, and made no attempt to address either Garth or Natalie. Indeed, he appeared to ignore their presence on the boat altogether; which, considering the shortness of the distance separating them, was not without its ridiculous side. Garth, refusing to be deceived by this apparent indifference, kept himself quietly on the alert. The breeze continued favorable but very light; and the day waxed hotter and hotter. By nightfall they had covered perhaps another thirty miles of the way. There had been one "spell" on shore, during which Garth and Natalie elected to remain on board, satisfied with a cold lunch.

A lovely night succeeded. The velvety floor of heaven was strewn lavishly with bright stars; and later, the moon, just past the full, rose out of the lake astern and hung, a lovely pale globe, in the eastern sky. The breeds fell asleep one by one, and for the first time the jabbering, the ki-yi-ing and the maddening stick-kettle were all stilled. The "Loseis" hovered over the lake with her gigantic wing spread, like some great bird of the night. The only evidences that she moved at all were the flecks of foam that drifted slowly astern under the counter.

Charley had constructed a little niche for Natalie among the freight astern—a bale of blankets serving for a seat, with a tall box inclined behind it for a back to lean against. She had insisted that Charley share it with her, and the boy had sat beside her too blissful to speak. In the end they both fell asleep, and Natalie's head dropped on his shoulder. In his dreams the boy smiled seraphically.

Garth watched them kindly and very enviously; and for the moment wished that he, too, were a boy, whom she need not take seriously. There was no sleep for him. He sat on the narrow seat encircling the stern, with his back against the gunwale, where, on the one hand he could watch the steersman elevated on his little platform, while on the other side he was prepared for any demonstration from the bow. The steersman was Natalie's humorous breed; his name was Aleck. Nick Grylls and Hooliam were together somewhere forward of the mast; in the darkness Garth could not place them.

Garth's rifle lay across his knees—he would have given it, with much to boot, for the quicker and handier revolver. He was painfully aware that nothing would suit Nick Grylls's purpose so well as to knock him swiftly on the head, and heave his body overboard. He shrewdly suspected that some such intention was the reason for this night sail. It is easy to seek danger, to ride at it with a shout, the pulses leaping—but to wait for it, to wait motionless in the still dark for an attack that may be delivered one knows not when nor from whence—that is the great ordeal. Garth clenched the stem of his pipe hard between his teeth; and with a resolute effort of his will, put down the hysteria that will at such a time constrict the stoutest throat.

The first interruption of the awful stillness came, not from man, but from the elements. All around the western horizon clouds mounted so swiftly and imperceptibly that neither Garth nor the helmsman was aware of what was preparing, until they had reached the zenith. Caribou Lake is known for its swift and terrible summer storms. A sharp crack of thunder was their first warning. Aleck shouted; and dark forms arose here and there from their resting places. Garth swallowed a sob of relief for the diversion. The storm might be playing right into Nick Grylls's hand; but one could face the bustle and uproar with renewed courage.

The sail was brought clattering to the deck; a couple of sweeps were hastily run out; and the "Loseis" was pulled for the nearest point of the shore. With true breed seamanship she was beached on a steep and stony incline on the lee side of a point. Garth tried his best to make their folly clear to them; but none of the crew, and least of all Hooliam, retained presence of mind to comprehend. With united strength the breeds dragged her up as far as they could, which was but little, and went through the same business of driving stakes into the bottom of the lake, and lashing the sternpost between. Garth threw up his hands in helpless exasperation. Tarpaulins and sails were spread over the cargo and lashed down. Charley made Natalie snug with a tarpaulin roof over her seat. Garth commanded him, no matter what might happen, not to leave her side.

The storm came roaring down the lake like a vast animate being; and there, in their exposed position, smote them hip and thigh. Each crash of thunder fell forth right upon the echo of the last; and the lightning played like wicked laughter on the face of the destroying heavens. Then came the rain, with pitiless, whistling whips that lashed the water, and bit cruelly into exposed flesh. Every man on board, save one, instantly dived under the sail-cloths; and Hooliam was the first to seek shelter.

Only Garth dared not relax his watch in the open. He maintained his place with his back against the stern, a piece of tarpaulin across his knees to keep his gun dry, and his eyes bent forward in the boat whence any move must be made on him. So sure was he that Grylls would attack him, he was scarcely conscious of the tumult that roared about his ears. The wind tore his hat off and the cold rain drenched him to the skin.

hands at the tables. How acrid was the smoke of Red Cross tobacco!

What were they singing at the piano?

"Till it seems the world is full of dreams,

Just to call you back to me.

There's a long, long Trail"—but there was no long Trail any more, not even in dreams.

LATER in that Paris he would have loved, came his Captain by chance to the hotel where Sister was staying.

To this Canadian girl with the interest in her eyes for the Southern Cross, he spoke of the dead man:

"Rode like the devil—his men loved him—lived straight, too." Lived straight! In that France of a thousand loves! Words came to her ears:

"Honor has come back as a king to earth.

And nobleness walks in our ways again,

And we have come into our heritage."

The Thirteenth Sonnet

my surprise, "this is one of Carres' sonnets."

He sat down without speaking and looked at me unflinchingly. At length he said slowly, almost painfully I thought.

"What meaning can it have for you?"

"Only one," I said, "you have held it back for reasons of your own. It is definitely dishonest."

"What reasons?" he said.

I paused for a moment, but my feeling of pity for the man was almost swept away by this discovery.

"What reasons," I said, "except jealousy?"

He looked for a moment as though I had struck him, but then he recovered himself.

"As good a reason as any other," he responded, and I saw that there was a smile of satisfaction beginning to show in his face.

"Yes, but it doesn't end here," I said, irritated by his complacency. "This sonnet must be included with the rest."

At that an instant alarm overspread his face. He rose and came and stood before me, leaning on the desk while he scanned my face with his deep-set eyes.

"You intend to let this be known?" he interrogated me.

"What else?" I said, growing more and more impatient with his absurd attitude.

He continued to look at me, his eyes narrowing, his expression changing until finally he said with a tremendous effort:

"That sonnet was written after Carres was dead."

"You mean?" I said, and paused regarding him still with perplexity. He turned back and faced me with an expression of extreme weariness.

"If you will pry into what does not concern you in the least," he said, "I wrote the sonnets."

He saw the expression that spread over my face, and taking a step towards the desk, he dived into a drawer and brought out a sheaf of papers, flinging them down before me.

"If you do not believe, you can see for yourself," he said, and walked away again in the direction of the window.

It took only one glance at the papers to see that he spoke the truth. Here were verses innumerable, all written in the same hand-writing, all showing the same beauty as the sonnets. There could be no doubt that he spoke the truth. This man was the author of the sonnets. But with this realization came the amazing fact that he had deliberately concealed it. He had given to Carres the fame of authorship. Why, in Heaven's name, why should he have been so casual to the fame that belonged to the author of the sonnets?

THE fact that he had written the sonnets was not in itself such a tremendous surprise. Instinctively I had begun to feel the truth of what he had just revealed. The surprise lay in the fact that he had not acknowledged the authorship of the sonnets. Poor, obscure, as he was, I could not understand why he should have pushed Carres farther into the limelight while he retreated farther into the shadows. That was where I was mystified.

"Will you tell me," I said at length, "why you have concealed this? Why did you allow this deception to go on? That is what I fall to understand."

He turned and came back slowly into the room.

"Isn't it clear to you," he inquired, "what would have been said if I should have claimed the authorship of the sonnets? Cannot you imagine the calumny? Is not the world always greedy to snatch away a beautiful woman's reputation? The sonnets were found among her papers. Would not that be enough to give scope for any amount of scandal?"

"But I don't understand"—I began stupidly.

"But I loved her," he said briefly. "No, she did not return my love. It was Carres whom she loved, but he . . . he was nothing but a machine . . . he cared for nothing but the making of endless books. He had no eyes even for her beauty. He chilled her love until she hid it away, she tried to keep it out of sight. She was continually upon her knees to him in spirit . . . but he did not even care to know that she was there. Oh, she suffered. She who could have been all warmth and light and affection. She seemed to me always a lonely figure in a chill chapel, adoring a figure of stone."

He paused, lapsing into a deep silence.

"It is curious," I said, "how life mocks at simplicity. It follows such devious ways."

But he was lost in his reflections.

"She was kind to me," he said at last turning his glance upon me, "she was kind to me because she knew what suffering was. She knew what it was to love without response, so she did not scoff at my sonnets. She said she loved them for the magic of the words, for the beauty of the thought. But they meant no more to her than that. A poet must love a star," he went on dreamily, "and if it but shines it is all that he can ask."

"But," I said sharply, to recall his wandering thoughts, "it is quixotic and absurd to allow the public to think that Carres wrote the sonnets. The sonnets are famous. Why should the fame not be yours? I don't imagine that you ever had any particular fondness for Carres."

He turned on me an uneasy glance.

"Carres . . . Carres does not matter one way or the other. You are thinking of how I hated him at college. That was all over years ago. A great passion sweeps little things like that aside. But no one must ever know about the sonnets. I trust to your honor never to reveal what you have found out. Can you not think what would be said . . . what odious fabrications would be built up around her name? You have come upon this by accident and you will forget it. You will only remember that Carres wrote the sonnets. The world must never know anything else."

"And you have counted the cost?" I said, looking at him curiously. He appeared such a strange figure, sitting there in his shabby coat, the glow of an inner light still upon his thin face. The author of the sonnets. "You are content," I said, "that the fame, the recognition, the applause shall go to Carres . . . while for you . . ."

"Obscurity," he said, "what else? I only ask that the name of Madeleine Carres be held as pure as she was herself."

"The book has had an enormous sale," I said thoughtfully.

"It is nothing to me to be poor," he said, "I have never been anything else."

Somehow it exasperated one. The man was immovable as a rock. What he said was true enough. If it were discovered that he had written the sonnets what scope for a scandal! How it would be seized upon, what a history built up, what a fabrication of lies! But the woman was dead! For the sake of a memory this man was sacrificing, was open handedly giving away all that could make life worth the living. At least, that was how it appeared to me.

"It is not only the sonnets," I said, "but any more verses that you may write . . . they would be easily recognized."

"Naturally," he said, "but I shall not write any more. If the sonnets were as fine as they are said to be, it is only because she inspired me. I could not have done it of myself. There was nothing in me that alone could have produced anything great. Madeleine Carres was the tinder from which I struck out fire."

I looked down at the sonnet lying on the desk.

"And this?" I hazarded.

Before I realized what he was doing he had struck a match and was holding the paper in the flame. It blackened and shrivelled like something alive. I watched it fascinated, until it crumbled down to a little heap of black ash. In those ashes I saw the death of ambition, of wealth, of fame, of everlasting recognition from the world. I looked at the curious figure in the crumpled shabby coat. He was laying those ashes at the altar of his ideal . . . at the altar of his love for Madeleine Carres.

Geography and How It Is Written

is a pyrrhotite, containing twenty-five per cent. sulphur. Naturally the sulphur fumes are liberated, and when the air is heavy and damp, and the wind in the wrong direction, they drift over the little town.

The drooping lilac tree that I saw, whose outer leaves were yellow and burnt, had not been assailed by grub or worm or frost.

It was "sulphured," "She must have forgotten to cover it when the wind blew this way," said the lady who pointed it out to me.

The people of Copper Cliff, notwithstanding the fumes, are able, with great care, to raise flowers, and I do not think the Victoria people, with their wonderful climbing roses, or Winnipeg with their twelve foot hedges of sweet peas, get any more delight from their free bloomers, than the Copper Cliff people get from their carefully nurtured blossoms. To raise a flower, in any country is a matter of pride, but in Copper Cliff it is an achievement!

The manager's wife took me to see her lilac bush, which had "fifty-three blossoms" on it. She knew them all by name. So would any of us if we had to run and cover the bush when the wind changed. I am here to testify that the bush was healthy and luxuriant in leaf and blossom.

The sulphur fumes are not nearly so bad since the roast-ovens were removed to a distance of twenty miles. But they still blow where they list, on occasions striking the town and leaving the grass sere and brown. They tarnish the silver, put holes in rubber goods, and strangers find them quite distressing.

The company admit that there are fumes! And they admit that they are destructive! I hardly expected that. Unlike the Vancouver people with their rain, or Winnipeg with its cold, they cheerfully own up to the fumes.

If you are a farmer, living near Copper Cliff, and your crop is attacked by the fumes, all you have to do is to invite the company's inspector to come down and view the ruins. He estimates what the crop was worth, and the company signs the cheque. On a bad year, when the rain has been delayed, or there has been too much, it is said the farmers in the Copper Cliff community turn longing eyes toward the roast-oven and wonder why the fumes have failed them. Sometimes rust comes on the crop, or it is attacked by an insect and for this, Nature gives no rebate! So no wonder the thrifty farmer prays for a good crop—or fumes!

COPPER CLIFF, although it is a bare spot, so far as herbage is concerned, is a hopeful indication of the good days to come, when employers and employees will recognize that they are not enemies but partners. It is also encouraging to see that the care, ingenuity and humane instincts of a company can overcome natural disadvantages and make life comfortable and happy for their people, and that it all pays in cold dollars and cents. While other companies find themselves unable to fill their contracts, on account of their men being on strike, the mines at Copper Cliff go gaily on, every one working, and every one happy. They prevent strikes before they take place, and every one is the gainer. It all bears out the contention that health and happiness are cheap at any price!

Actually it costs less to own a Hoover than not to own one. For this efficient cleaner saves the money you now spend in having your carpets cleaned. It eliminates the need or lowers the cost of much household help. As it scatters no dust to soil curtains or walls, it makes less frequent those bills for laundering and redecorating. Even of more importance is the sparing of your rugs from avoidable wear. By its exclusive ability to gently beat out all nap-wearing, embedded grit as it electrically sweeps and cleans by suction, The Hoover will pay for itself over and over in the prolonged life and beauty of your floor coverings.

"THE PRINT DRESS"

SOME people believe that the "print dress" belongs only to the age of innocence and simplicity. But it doesn't.

¶ True, print is still the material from which charming, inexpensive and ever-fresh dresses may be made for children. But older members of the household are continually finding new ways of using print for their own personal wardrobes—for decorative effect in house dress, garden costume or other apparel.

¶ Ask your retailer to show you some "Prue Cottons" prints. You will find inspiration for something new, quaint and inexpensive.

"Safety First" in the Prevention of Dental Decay

How Oral Prophylaxis, Properly Taught and Practiced by Individuals, will Save 80% of Common Tooth Ills.

RECENT discoveries tracing the cause of so many diseases to the teeth, make mouth hygiene and the prevention of dental caries (decay) one of the most vital subjects for thought before humanity today.

The author of this editorial is a dentist of national reputation.
The article is presented in the hope that it will inspire parents to correct any mouth deformities which may exist, and to anticipate the evil effects of tooth neglect by instilling in their children early in life the habit of daily care of the teeth.

If Oral Prophylaxis is efficiently taught and practiced by individuals, 80% of dental decay can be prevented.

Dentifrices, the bases of which are prepared chalk, can be used lavishly, and should be used in this way to net the best results.

The time for perfunctory cleansing is past when we know the danger of neglectful methods.

Neglected teeth may mean very soon decayed teeth.
Dead teeth may result in a focus of infection leading to many diseases that are the distress of mankind.

"Safety First" should be the motto of everyone regarding teeth.

So frequent examinations
by dentists should be made.
Many a conscientious and painstaking dentist has been surprised and painfully chagrined at finding a large new cavity in a tooth of a patient that he has seen six months previously.

Cavities start between teeth where even an expert cannot always detect them often until the cavity has grown so large that the pulp has been exposed.

To avoid this experience, have your teeth examined every three months.

RIBBON DENTAL CREAM

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

What Should a Safe, Efficient Dentifrice Be?

A SAFE, efficient dentifrice should be a cleanser—and that alone.
Its sole object should be to clean the teeth—without injury.
It should contain neither harmful acids nor harsh grit to scratch the enamel and injure the gums.

Its base should be the finest precipitated chalk, specially made under careful chemical and microscopic tests.

It should be mildly alkaline because saliva in a healthy, clean mouth is mildly alkaline. It should make no pretense to medical properties.

And lastly, to encourage twice-a-day brushing, it should be delicious in flavor—free from objectionable "druggy" taste.

THE SAFE, SANE DENTIFRICE

Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is all of this—a safe, mildly alkaline dentifrice. It cleans the teeth as they should be cleaned—thoroughly, pleasantly, safely.

Dentists favor it for what it does, and does well—and for what it does not do and makes no claim to do.

They and physicians, too, use it every day in their own families.

It is the safe, normal dentifrice for you and so delicious that your children will use it without urging.

March Winds and Ways

BY THE EDITOR

THE month of March can hardly be called popular—either with poets or with lesser folk. Even Tennyson can find nothing kinder to say about its prevailing weather than to write breezily of “all in the wild March morning.” Of course, someone will come along and tell us that if it were not for the blustering winds of March we should have no delicate spring flowers in April and May. That is all true, but it does not make us like the gales any better, nor regard the slush under foot with kindlier eye. March, in fact, is a very shrew of a month, and yet we are rather glad that an artist has come along and given us a new March—a gay young girl with a breeziness all her own—who appears to have a frisky hare in captivity as a companion for her walk. The cover for this month is a picture which truly mirrors the March sky and woodland. The snow is almost gone, the flowers have not yet come—and it is a youthful, defiant March that blows across the land—a March which sets the blood in your veins a-tingle and makes you realize that the Northland is the home of sturdy and vigorous citizens, equal to the day's work and ready for the day's fun. This cover is the work of a Toronto artist—Mary Wrinch, A.R.C.A.

The picture of our May cover is one of the happiest efforts by Herbert S. Palmer, A.R.C.A., who has chosen a bright and spring-like scene and treated it with originality in color and grouping. We hope to have other covers by this artist, whose work is unusually vivid.

ONE of our most interesting features this month is an article from Janey Canuck (Mrs. Arthur Murphy), who is president of the Federated Women's Institutes, a magistrate of the Women's Court in Edmonton, and an officer in nearly every philanthropic organization of the Albertan capital. Mrs. Murphy is a writer of books, also, and has a familiarity with the literary classics which comes only from “browsing in an old library.” In her article in this issue, “Out of the North,” Mrs. Murphy, in a whimsical vein, tells of setting forth from Edmonton last autumn for two conventions to be held in Montreal—one of them the meeting of the Board of Directors of the Federated Women's Institutes; the other, the meeting of the Canadian Women's Press Club—which had not held a Dominion gathering since 1913, when Mrs. Murphy was elected president, retaining that office for seven years.

Those who know Mrs. Murphy best are well aware that she has a refreshing sense of humor which makes bearable life's little ironies and which gives a smiling aspect to many a hard problem. That her manifold official positions and heavy responsibilities have not diminished Mrs. Murphy's sense of the occasional absurdity of things is evident in the buoyancy of this article which sets forth the early experiences of her journey towards her old home in the East.

MARCH is none too early to begin to consider the garden. In fact, away out in Victoria by the Pacific and off near Lunenburg by the Atlantic, March is really a spring month, and the man with the hoe is considering the matter of seeds and sprouts. Ever since the days of our First Parents, who made such a poor thing of gardening, humanity has found that occupation a difficult but certain way back to Eden. Most of you, then, will be interested in this article on “preparedness” which Mr. A. B. Cutting has written for the benefit of all who would have their own vine and fig tree in flourishing condition. Mr. Cutting knows whereof he writes, and has been for years Editor of “The Canadian Horticulturist,” being thoroughly at home among the flower beds and in the remotest recesses of the vegetable garden. Of course, all of you who hope to have prize gardens will read with interest Mr. Cutting's article and will straightway profit by his excellent advice. There will be other “garden stuff” in April and May, and our “door-yards will be brighter blooming,” as the poet has sung, because we have undertaken the making of a garden.

IN the spring a young man's fancy may lightly turn to thoughts of love—or baseball; but the feminine fancy is concerned chiefly with new furnishings for the household and new clothes for the season of earth's renewal. The new fabrics of autumn are interesting enough in their way, no doubt; but tweed, Bolivia cloth and even kitten's-ear broadcloth will not bear comparison with the fabrics which come in the spring.

There are such alluring voiles and silks and crepes that, if you do not wish to go home with lightened pocket-book, you must hurry past the windows and avoid the counters where the latest products of Fashion's looms are spread to catch Milady's eye. In our March issue, you will find some of the suits and many of the blouses which help to make the springtime a rejuvenation of nature and human nature. From the Pictorial Review come the fashion pages which bring gladness to the heart of the woman reader who wishes to combine the smart and the serviceable in her new spring raiment. There is a most attractive page this month, written by Charlotte M. Storey, which gives us pictures and descriptions of the new hats—and if there is anything more interesting than a spring gown, it is the hat which blooms on Easter Day.

FELS-NAPTHA

What does "Fels-Naptha" mean?

It means the perfect combination of good soap and real naptha.

What is Naptha?

A wonderful dirt-loosener used by dry-cleaners to cleanse and freshen dainty fabrics and restore delicate colors. Naptha makes dirt let go, and carries away all odors from clothes. Naptha is good for clothes because it thoroughly cleanses; and thoroughly clean clothes last longer.

Why combine Naptha with Soap?

Because when combined the Fels-Naptha way, the cleansing quality of naptha is added to that of good soap, and together they do the work quicker and better than either naptha or soap alone.

Why not use Soap alone and pour Naptha into the Wash-water?

Naptha of itself will not mix with water. But it does mix when carried into the water by Fels-Naptha, because of the individual Fels-Naptha process which makes naptha soluble in water. Therefore every bubble of Fels-Naptha suds contains naptha. It works through every fibre of the clothes loosening all the dirt.

Aren't all "Naptha" Soaps alike?

No. The word "naptha" has been misused. Fels-Naptha is the original naptha soap. It contains real naptha. The exclusive Fels-Naptha method of combining good soap and real naptha has never been duplicated. Fels-Naptha holds its naptha. Blindfolded you can tell Fels-Naptha from all other soaps by its clean naptha odor.

What Color for Soap?

Color has little to do with the purity or cleansing-value of soap. Some good soaps are black; others white, green, brown, yellow and golden. Fels-Naptha is golden because that is the natural color of the good materials that help to hold its naptha. Fels-Naptha makes snowy suds and whitest clothes.

Why isn't Fels-Naptha hard as a Brick?

Hard soaps mean hard rubbing. Hard rubbing means wear on clothes, and a backache. Fels-Naptha rubs off easily and dissolves in the wash water. The cleansing work is done by soap, naptha and water all thoroughly mixed.

What Soap for Washing-machines?

Fels-Naptha is the ideal soap for the washer because its naptha loosens the dirt even before the washer starts. Then the suds churn through and through the clothes, quickly flushing all dirt away. And the inside of the machine will not be sticky.

Are there Fels-Naptha Flakes?

No, but it is a simple matter to make your own—and more economical. Just shave off into the water the chips or flakes of Fels-Naptha as you need them. This gives you the added cleansing value of naptha in washing woolens, dainty lingerie and all fine things.

How many other Uses has Fels-Naptha?

The housewife constantly finds new uses for Fels-Naptha. Besides laundry-work, Fels-Naptha is wonderful for taking spots from rugs, carpets, cloth, draperies. Brightens woodwork instantly. Always keep a cake in the bathroom for very dirty hands and for enamel of bathtub and washstand. Give your home and yourself the benefit of the real naptha soap. Order Fels-Naptha of your grocer today!

Three things identify Fels-Naptha—the red-and-green wrapper, the golden bar, the clean naptha odor.

Copyright, Canada, 1921, by Fels & Co.

Fels-Naptha safely cleans anything cleanable and washes anything washable.

A Letter On Our National Life

A writer in Our Pacific Province considers our expression of pride in national affairs

THE discussion regarding schools, public and private, which arose out of an "O Canada" letter, published on this page some months ago, has taken a new direction. Mrs. Rosewarne's letter in the January issue has evoked some correspondence from Vancouver, which is of more than passing interest. We are pleased to publish the following communication from Miss Isabel B. Macdonald, who has clear-cut convictions, with the courage to maintain them. This correspondent reflects upon that part of Mrs. Rosewarne's letter which referred to our "Canadianism" as a subject of vital importance to every one of us.

MRS. ROSEWARNE'S letter has emphasized what to my mind is the thing most needed in Canada to-day—a more definite expression of our national life. It is not, as some think, mere twaddle to speak of "pride in our own country," nor is it a silly sentimentality to applaud the flag now and then; there is both a moral and material advantage in so doing. In all new countries a "spoken patriotism" is essential to knit together the national fabric, to enthuse, to win people to and encourage them to remain in the country. Indeed the Dominion loses to her southern neighbor many valuable citizens for no other reason than this.

Recently I returned to Canada hungry for the gratification of "reading Canadian thoughts and seeing Canadian scenes extolled." I asked one man why he did not "boost" the city in which he was living. He replied with a superior smile: "What is the use of talking about—a lily?"

"But in this busy world," I said, "many people fail to see the lily till you tell them of it."

On another occasion, looking out across the water, to where the sunset tinged the snow-capped peaks of a wonderful range of mountains, I remarked to a friend upon the beauty of the scene.

"I never notice the mountains much," she answered. I am aware that sentiment itself has much to do with the beauty we see, even in a landscape; but had my friend picked up a folder in a railway station with a miniature reproduction of what she was then looking upon, and some one had added a few words to fire her imagination, she would have been ready to "save up her pennies" to get there. We have no great and famous art galleries in this new country of ours, but we have scenes such as these that no artist can paint and no treasure house in Europe possesses.

I do not think that the Canadian people are phlegmatic; they are simply unduly conservative. There are two reasons for this. They do not wish to copy the Americans in what seems an egotistical self-expression and they have long been under that British influence which, so far as the Dominions are concerned, has ever had a tendency to "keep the child modest." Although of British birth myself, I strongly disapprove of the "residential" element in Canada which would put a damper on native enthusiasm. Indeed only too often the British immigrant to this country offers a peculiar problem. He is of course not a foreigner and no suggestion to that effect should be made. No man from any part of the Empire should be classed as a "foreigner" in Canada, or permitted to feel that he is, and this regardless of whether or not he is a worthy specimen of his race. But if any man thinks that being under his own flag gives him "the right to grumble," he should be quickly disabused of this idea. He should be reminded of the fact that we cannot demand loyalty of foreigners if it is not forthcoming in our own people; that he should bring the same sentiment, imagination and valiant spirit to this new land that men of an earlier generation did when they looked out across the sea and said: "Yonder we will make our home."

Canadians are not all of British origin, which is in itself another reason why the British immigrant should be amenable to the same laws as other "new-comers" in Canada. In mentioning this I would minimize the part which the British people have played in the making of Canada. I sometimes wonder if some of our Eastern Canadians, whose parents and grandparents were native born, and who have themselves grown somewhat insular in the matter of nationality, realize that it was the British immigrant who made Western Canada from the borders of Manitoba to the Pacific Coast. I never think without emotion of my own childhood on the prairies; of the indomitable courage and oftentimes poignant suffering of those English and Scottish people to whom, quite apart from racial affiliation, Canada owes a great debt.

My early acquaintance with the life of the immigrant under such conditions has given me a great sympathy for him. To be homesick in a far-away land—a land that in no way reminds you of the one you left—is a very real grief. Often I have heard women from Ontario speak with a pathetic longing in their voices, of "the apple-blossoms down home," as they looked out on the tawny plains of Saskatchewan. If the Ontario woman, relatively near the "old home" had such a longing, what of those who were dreaming of the "green sward, the soft mist and the purple hills" far beyond the ocean?

In the land to the south of us they have a big task as regards immigrants and—perhaps because it is big—they handle it roughly. They have a Big Melting Pot into which they plunge the hapless immigrant regardless of his own sensibilities. The system of amalgamating various races into one, though it be asking the lamb to lie down with the lion, is more or less effective in creating a uniform sentiment of loyalty. Under no other flag but the Union Jack have we a system which permits the various families and races of people to remain distinct and teach their traditions.

The Melting Pot is well as far as it goes, but I think that Canada might do better. I hope she will never go "slumming" among her immigrants, nor remind them that they are "eating her bread," when in truth they are earning an honest living.

In so far as our loyalty is of a dual nature, it means a genuine reciprocity between ourselves and all other people throughout the Empire. A girl friend of mine told me the other day that she had seen "a big bunch of foreigners" get off one of the Trans-Pacific boats.

"Foreigners!" I answered. "Where did they come from?"

"Looked like Australians," she replied.

"But my dear, the Australians are not foreigners," I responded.

And this reminds me of an amusing incident that happened a few months ago in a little town in Manitoba, where the Imperial Press Delegates were being entertained. On seeking their places at the table it was found that there were places set for the Australian and Tasmanian delegates, but none for New Zealand. Much mystified the New Zealand delegate inquired of the committee to discover that his country was supposed to be "part of Australia." New Zealand, I am told, remembers her mortification at that Manitoba luncheon, and when Canada goes to visit her she may find that "plates are laid for Great Britain, the United States and—Cuba."

"All Phonographs In One"

PRIMARILY, the Brunswick is a versatile and satisfying musical instrument. Secondly, it is an exquisite article of furniture.

From both standpoints the Brunswick appeals profoundly to people of cultivated taste.

Its qualities as a musical instrument are dependent upon certain exclusive mechanical features, among which may be especially mentioned:—

The Oval All-Wood Horn. You never heard of a square horn in a megaphone or any musical instrument. The laws of acoustics prove that sound waves travel in ovals and circles. So we build the Brunswick Horn oval in shape and entirely of wood. This makes the tones rich, mellow and, above all, natural.

The Three-in-One Ultona. This is the Brunswick invention which plays all records correctly, giving to each make of record, by a mere twist of the wrist, the precise needle, the exact diaphragm and the correct weight.

The Four-Spring Silent Motor. As noiseless and as free from vibration as a watch, the Brunswick four-spring motor plays twenty-seven minutes with one winding. The springs are so arranged that, even if one or two springs should break, the motor keeps on running.

Then there are the Brunswick Tone Modifier, the Automatic Stop and the convenient Filing System.

As a piece of furniture, the Brunswick Cabinet is unrivalled in design, workmanship and finish. Every detail is perfect.

The record of its manufacturers, the Brunswick - Balke - Collender Company extends over a period of seventy-eight years. Every Brunswick Cabinet represents the accumulated experience and resources of a house which is known the whole world over for leadership in wood craftsmanship.

A Story of a Boy's Adventure and a Man's Discovery

The Afterthought

By Marjorie L. C. Pickthall

ILLUSTRATED BY G. W. L. BLADEN

THE Mother's voice followed them down the trail. "And if you see my Afterthought round the shingle-mill, send him home."

The big Quincey twins answered simultaneously, as they often did. Only one roared,

"He's at the store, Sweetest," and the other, "He's round the orchard, Honey-Mum." Then they looked at each other doubtfully.

"Well," said Rod, wearily, "how about it this time?"

"I told him to get me some stamps at the store," explained Ned.

"And I told him he wasn't to dare quit the orchard."

"Of course, I didn't know you'd said. . . ."

"Nor did I." Rod's handsome face was harassed. "If he's gone to the store, I ought to hit him for it."

"And I ought to hit him if he hasn't gone."

"Which ever it is —"

"Don't you worry," said Ned darkly, "it won't be! That kid will have fixed it all right! He'll have fixed it by ignoring both of us and going to the shingle-mill."

They looked at each other uneasily. Rod said, "What will we do?"

"On second thoughts—I guess we'd better not do anything."

They strode on together. Presently Rod remarked with bitterness, "That kid was just born to break up the family."

"Mother must have been mad," assented Ned gloomily.

They walked in silence down the pleasant forest-scented trail until the high drone of a power saw whined through the trees, and they came out in the clearing where the little mill stood. There was no need to ask if the Afterthought was here.

On the edge of the clearing stood a section of an old and tottering flume, dating from the days when bigger lumber than shingle-bolts had been supplied by that part of the country. The flume had long been dry. But as the twins looked they saw a small figure starting from the higher end, toboggan down it on a shingle with a velocity suggesting grease, hurtle from the lower end, which was some eight feet above the ground, and subside in a heap of rotted sawdust and dead boughs.

They ran in grim silence, and plucked the Afterthought from the old dump. He appeared to be unhurt, though his nose had suffered. They set him on his feet and began to brush him clean.

He was a small, plain child, with those wise, tender, faithful brown eyes one sees in a cocker spaniel. He now stood looking softly at his brothers over a large gray handkerchief which he held to his nose.

"What are you doing?" demanded Rod sternly.

"Can't you see?" asked the Afterthought. "Bleedin'." He surveyed the handkerchief, and added in a satisfied tone, "Pints. . . ."

"Well, Mother wants you. You're to go home right away."

"Where are you fellers goin'?" asked the Afterthought gently.

"Over to the Inlet. . . . You can't come. Mother wants you."

Said the Afterthought complacently, "It never hurts a woman to be kep' waitin' for you."

"Well," breathed the scandalized Rod, "this woman is not to be kept waiting. You go home this minute, George."

The Afterthought, from a safe distance, lifted dog-like eyes of faith and pleading. "I'd sooner go with you, brother."

"It's pretty lonely for me with no brothers of my own age."

"Well, you can't."

"It's—it's pretty lonely for me with no brothers of my own age. I—I guess I'd be a better boy if you took me around with you more."

"You—go—home."

"I'll bet you're not going to the cabin," said George clearly. "You're goin' to see Miss Hallett."

The twins, avoiding each other's eyes, stood as if they'd been stung. Their faces were queer, as if the child's words had uncovered some strange unhappy thing they feared. And the Afterthought wondered if he'd gone too far. "Anyway," he declared hastily, "if it's Miss Hallett, I won't come, thanks."

"You—don't approve of her?" inquired Rod rather strangely.

The Afterthought, teetering on wide-stretched toes as if he wore high heels, and slapping an imaginary boot with an imaginary quirt, drawled slowly. "She's sure a good-looker, but I wouldn't go to the trouble of branding her with a Double O. She's a quitter. She's the kind that'll hawg the range all summer and lay down on you first time you rope a dogie. She—"

Rod said gently, "How far back was it that you quit?" And, as he spoke, he just touched his hand on Ned's shoulder.

The phrases that followed, though inoffensive, were of such unparalleled technical pungency that Rod's hand met Ned's in one impassioned clap across the Afterthought's mouth. Rod said quietly, "That'll do, George. Now you go."

THE Afterthought went swiftly.

He went with the more willingness in that he knew his brothers would not see Miss Hallett round the little hotel which they would pass, going to the Inlet. She was spending the day at the house of some friends, back near the store. He trotted back along the trail contentedly. Once he looked behind him. His brothers were walking heavily, heads bent, broad shoulders uneasily hunched, the width of the trail between them. As he looked, they suddenly stopped, and swung to face each other. They stood very still. The Afterthought hesitated a minute, then went resolutely on, and a turning hid them. He was breathing heavily; now and then he paused and spat accurately at a stump.

"Our family," he meditated aloud after one of these interludes, "has run with some queer bunches. But quitters and Quinceys, though they start the same, don't end together. I got to get busy or there'll be trouble. I can't have the family broken up for her."

An hour later, Miss Doris Hallett, sitting and swinging luxuriously in a chair on the porch of her friend's house, was aware of a small and homely boy who stood at the foot of the steps, watching her unwinkingly. She smiled at him from under lazy eyelids, and the sun gleamed in her bronze hair. Beautiful eyes, beautiful hair, a beautiful figure, yet not a beautiful woman. But she could not be in any town a week without every man knowing it, or walk down a street without every man being aware of her.

"Hello!" said the little boy. "There's a dead Indian in the woods."

"Is there?" Miss Hallett smiled again, recognizing him for little Georgie Quincey. "Then I suppose he's a good Indian. How long has he been there, Georgie?"

"Oh, twenty years, I guess," said the Afterthought reluctantly. He eyed her with hope, but Miss Hallett did not respond. He guessed the Indian was too dead. He said, "Henry Peters has his thigh-bone."

"Oh?" Miss Hallett still sounded lazy. The Afterthought came up one step. His soft eyes were lambent, eager lamps. He said guardedly, "Yes, he has it in the chicken house. He uses it to pound sheep. I could show it to you if you like."

"Oh, I don't think I want to see a bone."

There was no accounting for women, Georgie concluded. He came up another step. He said, "My brothers have gone to see if the cabin on the Inlet wants a new roof."

"Have they, Georgie?"

"Yes, they wouldn't take me."

"Too bad," she yawned.

"Oh, I dunno. I guess they wanted to be alone. You see,

I think they were going to fight."

"To fight?" She sat up suddenly, a queer glow in her eyes.

"They'd pretty near started at it when I left them."

"Fighting?" The girl's breath came short, there was a strange little greedy twitch of her red lips. She said in a careless voice, "I thought they were such a model pair of brothers. What were they going to fight about?"

"I dunno." The Afterthought pondered her wistfully. "It makes me feel bad. But I dunno. Do you?"

"I could guess, perhaps," answered Doris Hallett, with a strange excited little laugh. "I could—guess."

Georgie quivered and did not seem to hear. He was gazing pathetically into the forest. "It makes me feel bad," he repeated. "They may be at it right now. Or they may have quit, and one of 'em may be layin' there in the cabin, all bloody. Quarts," he added with brief ecstasy, "all over the place. . . I wish I dare go and see."

There was a silence in which came no sound but the sound of Doris Hallett's fingers, beating on the arms of her chair. Then she said, in the same, queer, excited little voice, "Is it very far to the cabin?"

"It's a good way by the trail. But there's a short cut through the woods."

Silence again, and the beating of two hearts. Then, with a fierce movement, the girl stood up.

"Let's go," she said, "and see!"

"Oh, Miss Hallett," answered the rider of the flame, "I'd be scared. I wouldn't dare!"

She stood up royally, laughing, bright-eyed; not averse even to the awe in this child's eyes. She moved down the steps splendidly enough, then turned. "Come," she said, "come and show me the way! I dare!"

"Roped, by the Great Brass Spurs!" said the Afterthought to himself; and took her hand shyly, and led her into the forest.

After an hour, a certain dubiousness began to show like a shadow in the flame of her vanity. She said, "Are you sure this is the way?"

"The Inlet's over there, Miss Hallett," Georgie's arm described a generous sweep.

"It's a very rough trail."

It was not a trail. It was a deer path. The Afterthought was silent, glancing anxiously at the sun. It was certainly lower. They climbed on without speaking; to himself the Afterthought was saying, "When 'll be the right time to do it?" Miss Hallett was saying to herself, "Two brothers, fighting—for me!" The words were rich and heady in her mouth as wine.

She never noticed when the deer path died out. She never noticed when Georgie turned from its direction and led her up a long hillside. A light fire must once have cleared the ground of small stuff, leaving the great timber untouched; for they moved without much difficulty through fern and salal-berry; while two hundred feet overhead the evergreen branches roofed them from the sky. Later, much later, they gained the crest of the range. And there Miss Hallett cried out in keen alarm.

"Why!" she said. "The sun's setting!"

It was. It was almost down. Level gold lances cleared the opposite range. Miss Hallett's face took on a curious hard look. All the fire died out of her. She looked round at the forest. Then she turned to the child. "What have you done?" she asked.

"I guess I've got a little lost," confessed the Afterthought. "I guess we better not go on to the cabin."

"Go on?" cried Doris Hallett unsteadily. She stared again at the silent trees. They seemed to close round her implacably, which ever way she looked; trees, silent, huge, impenetrable; merciless, and each moment, to her fancy, darker. She shook a little under the strange chill of her nerves, the old panic of forest places, Pan's terror. Suddenly she caught the Afterthought by his thin shoulders and gave him a little hard shake. "Go on?" she said unsteadily. "I—I wouldn't go on for the world. Find the way home. We must get home before it's dark. Before it's dark, do you hear?"

"Yes, Miss Hallett," said Georgie dutifully.

They turned and hurried down the side of the hill. The ground seemed to have become inexplicably rougher since they went up. Miss Hallett suffered in transit. Again and again Georgie said confidently, "There's the path we came by, Miss Hallett." But it never was. And each time Georgie murmured timidly, "I guess I'm still a little lost, Miss Hallett."

The sky was bright; but the trees seemed each to be the nucleus of a store of winced shadows, bodiless darknesses. Miss Hallett was hurrying blindly. She had, it was obvious, no sense of direction. She would go on thus until she dropped, the human mind in her utterly overwhelmed by the spirit of the trees. There was something a little dreadful in this senseless concentration on haste. For an instant, the Afterthought was dismayed. Then he set his teeth. It was time, he concluded, to finish his design.

He lingered behind Miss Hallett on the descent. When she was almost out of sight he set his left toe behind his right heel, in the manner known to every low-class comedian, and tripped himself artistically. As he fell he gave a cry.

The youth of our age owes much to the cinematograph. Georgie was aware that the picture he presented, east helpless among the ferns, lacked little of pathos. But he was vaguely disturbed. Something had gone wrong. He felt shaken. That fall had not turned out just what he expected.

"Oh! Miss Hallett!" cried Georgie pitifully into the shadows. "Oh! Miss Hallett!"

He lay quite still while she returned to him. She came in little irregular bursts and starts of speed. As she leaned over him he could see that her face was quite hard and white, and that her hair was untidy and her sleeve torn. She said with a curious impatience, "What is it? What have you done now?"

"I'm afraid I've hurt my leg, Miss Hallett."

"Which one?"

Georgie decided rapidly which one was to be hurt, and said, "The right one."

"Can you stand on it?"

"I will try," said Georgie patiently, "if you will help me up."

She set her hands under his arms and lifted him. She held him so a moment, without gentleness. "Now," she said quickly, "try. See if you can walk."

Georgie calculated with lightning rapidity, which was his right foot, and lowered it gingerly. He gasped. An expression of amazement, outrage, and pain held his small face rigid. Miss Hallett removed her hands.

"Oh!" yelled Georgie, in a shaking voice. "The blame thing's really bust, by heck!" and he slipped down in a small heap at Miss Hallett's feet.

It is to be supposed that he fainted. He knew nothing more until he found himself resting on the slope, propped against a log. Miss Hallett was standing in front of him. And it was nearly dark. Yes, the Afterthought concluded, with an unexpected twinge, it was nearly quite dark. . .

"M-M-Miss H-H-Hallett," whispered the Afterthought.

She was moving up and down in front of the log with the jerky restlessness of latent hysteria. She said sharply, "Well, what are we to do now?"

"I g-g-guess we better wait till someone comes to look for us."

"Wait here? In the forest? In the dark? . . . I couldn't. . . He could hear the sharp sound of her indrawn breath. "I—I'd go mad with fear. . ."

Georgie, you see, had let himself in for a good deal. A sight of the naked, black, primitive terror that hides in civilized souls like a criminal in a town is never a pleasant sight. He shivered as he watched and listened to the woman who paced up and down in front of the log; he paid for all his sins. And it grew quite dark.

Later she said, "Not to know where we are. . . it's horrible, horrible. . . He could hear the beating of her hands. He looked up at the darkness overhead, which was the forest, the great ceiling of the boughs; and in it he saw, leading from where he lay, a narrow lane of stars. . .

"Miss Hallett," said Georgie in a grave voice like a man's, "we're right at the head of the path. The path's there."

"The path. . . ?"

"Yes, Miss Hallett. We're not lost."

"Oh, my God," whispered the woman. And Georgie shut his eyes. She was suddenly very still. Her eyes, too, had found that narrow channel of stars. Under it was the path. At the end of the path were houses, faces, voices, and above all, light! She took a little run towards it.

"Miss Hallett," said Georgie gently.

She moved slowly back to the log. Presently she said in a strange dead-level voice, "But there's the boy. I can't carry him in the dark. And I can't leave him."

She was not addressing the Afterthought, who lay quite motionless, his arm covering his eyes, as if he were ashamed. She sat down on the end of the logs.

"I can't leave him. . ."

"When," wondered a small detached voice in Georgie's mind, "is she going to quit?"

"I can't leave him."

The forest was dark, immeasurably still, roofing them from all but that little ribbon of stars.

"I mustn't leave him. . ."

That was all the Afterthought heard, that dry, monotonous whispering repetition. Later, he did not hear even that. More knowledge, unfit for little boys, came to him; he knew what it was to feel forsaken.

But not for very long. For at the coming of the dark, an anxious Mother had sought out a strange, grim, and tight-lipped Ned, who was holding one hand surreptitiously in a pail of water in the back kitchen. And in a minute that changed Ned had come upon an equally altered Rod, with troubled eyes, who was trying, with the aid of a flashlight and a mirror behind the woodpile, to comb his hair so it would hide a cut over his eye.

Two hours back, that implacable alien Ned had sworn never to speak to his brother again. Yet now he said, "That kid's lost!"

"Our Afterthought?"

"Yes. And she. . . Miss Hallett, too. They were seen this afternoon, going up the deer track to Baldhead. Come on."

"Wait till I get the lantern," said Rod quietly, and came.

That deer track had taken Miss Hallett and the Afterthought some time to travel. The two big Quinceys had not been following it an hour when a woman beat into the circle of lantern-light that travelled with them, like a moth.

Doris Hallett had never looked so beautiful as when she broke suddenly from the dark and the silence that had betrayed her; for now her lovely soulless coloring had a spirit, even if it was only the spirit of fear. Her bright hair was loose, her pale fine silks torn to whispering ribbons. Ned was in the lead. She fluttered to him and clung. His arm went round her, he stood very still, looking down at the fair head on his shoulder. For one immeasurable and perfect instant the forest seemed to hold a perfect thing.

Presently Rod said quietly, "Here's one of 'em, anyway. The other can't be far off."

The girl's eyes were fixed on the lantern in Rod's hand. Wide, shallow eyes, drugged with fear. "Oh!" she breathed. "The light. . . I was afraid. . ."

Ned's voice was deep, with a little quiver in it, when he said, "You're all right. You've had a bad scare, I'm afraid. It's not safe for strangers alone to go off the trails. . ."

She said blankly, "But I wasn't alone—"

THERE was an odd little stillness. She and Ned had been close together. Now, something born of the forest, the merciless revealing forest, slipped between them. And Rod said, "Then where is Georgie?"

In some fibre of her soul, never awakened before, she was aware of something new in the faces, in the voices, of the two men she had played with for a summer's amusement. She could not speak. She pointed back along the trail. And suddenly, she knew that she would have got off cheaply if she could have given a year of her life in exchange for the necessity of that gesture.

But those simple young woodsmen who had fought for her sake were still silent. And words were forced from her at last, confusedly. "He fell, just when we'd found the track again. . . No, he's not hurt badly. I couldn't carry him in the dark. I—I didn't know what to do. I—I left him—to get help."

They said nothing. She repeated once more, eagerly, "To get help. . ." She was strangely confused. The foundations of her self-esteem crumbled. She was shaking, burning with—yes, with shame.

She had left Georgie because she was afraid. The other was a lie, to which she suddenly clung as if it was the last rag of her clothing. And the men knew it was a lie.

Rod said gently, "How far back was it that you quit?" And as he spoke, he just touched his hand on Ned's shoulder. And Ned, with a queer hurt breath, stepped back from Doris Hallett. Just one step, but he stepped a long way; right out of her life. Rod shoved the lantern into his hand, saying, "Go on. I'll wait here with—her. . ."

Ned took the light and went without a word.

He went on a long way. The forest was very still, and that stillness was salve to a young heart suffering its first disillusionment. Once he stopped and laid his hand half-lovingly on the stone-gray bole of a fir, where in the lantern light the Spanish moss gleamed like veils of dew. "She was scared," he muttered. "It was too big for her. She couldn't measure up to it. She went off and quit a hurt kid. . . Poor little thing. . ."

It was not the Afterthought he pitied.

Presently he said, "What in thunder's that?"

He listened. Then he knew. It was the Afterthought, keeping his courage up with indomitable song.

It came to Ned's ears, an odd reedy sound, drawled through innumerable silences.

"Sal Lou come down to the lil' corral,
And she sez to me, sez she,
'I guess fer you there's another gal
And another feller fer me.
Fer I ain't no use at a round-up dance
Nor cuddlin' a bench in the park,
Fer the feller,' she sez, 'as won't take a chance
On kissin' a gal in the d-d-d-dark.'"

The last word faltered. A dismayed grin drove from Ned's face the grim yet pitiful look which had been there since he left Doris Hallett. "Whew!" he said. "Mother 'd have a fit if she heard him singing 'Sal Lou.' I hope he don't know the chorus!"

He pressed on, listening so anxiously he forgot to shout.

"Sal Lou, Sal Lou,
I'm far away from you—"

"Georgie!" yelled Ned anxiously. "You there? Hold on, I'm coming to you, kid. You all right?"

"Sure!" replied the Afterthought from the darkness. . . "I'm far away from you, B-but I always k-keep your k-k-kind advice in m-mind—"

"Georgie!" yelled Ned again. "Don't you sing! Don't! Shout, so's I can hear where you are. . ."

When Ned reached the log against which the Afterthought sat, he was tactful enough not to turn the light on his small brother's face. Nor did he make a single remark nor ask one question, which was unusual. He just said, "Mother's waiting supper," and gathered the Afterthought into his arms, hurt leg and all. And the Afterthought found it kind of nice to be carried that way. Big brothers had their uses after all.

Presently, when the Afterthought had stopped making a queer little sniffing sound of which Ned took no notice, he said gravely, "Say, Ned."

"Well, youngster?"

"It was kind of Miss Hallett to go and fetch you, wasn't it?"

"Yes," answered Ned, in the same careful, grave voice, "it was." A little later, he said suddenly, "Say, Georgie, you're white all through. You're a gentleman. . ."

A little later yet, he whispered stealthily, "Say, Georgie. . ."

"Yes?"

"Were you honest-to-goodness lost?"

There was a long silence. Then the Afterthought coughed. "Things," he said cautiously, "didn't turn out just as I 'spected. But there's some things one gentleman never asks another." To himself he said drowsily, "Quitters and Quinceys, they start right, but they ain't in the same finish. I wonder if he's goin' to take her out in the canoe to-morrow like he'd thought of, or if I k'n have it. . ."

Well, no, Ned Quincey didn't take her out in the canoe, though he'd thought of it. But afterthoughts are sometimes best.

A Story of How a Wife Achieved Her Independence

Mrs. Baucher's Sheep

By Sara Galbraith Mosher

ILLUSTRATED BY MAUDE MacLAREN

WITH a satisfied sigh, Mrs. Baucher dropped her shears, and allowed the bleating, terrified ewe to join its shorn fellows.

"Good wool we got it this year," she remarked to her daughter, Domka, a girl of sixteen, who had been helping her mother to shear the five sheep. "Enough it is to buy for you white hat with flowers, and maybe white dress like teacher lady wears. A proud day it will be when I see you stand in church dressed so fine in the English way."

"But, mother, the sheep are yours," Domka remonstrated. "You should buy a dress for yourself."

"In the fall, will be five fat lambs to sell; but the wool money is for thee. Nu, the milking must we do, and then to bed, since to-morrow we go to wash in the river."

At breakfast next morning Mrs. Baucher announced that she and Domka were going to the river to do a three weeks' wash, and would be away most of the day. "So your own dinner must you get, Ivan," she ended. "Cold pork there is, and much bread, and you can boil for yourself the tea."

"What for a dinner is that for a hungry man?" Ivan Baucher grumbled. "Grafina or Tatiana must to stay home from the school this day, and cook for me the hot dinner."

The two girls looked unhappily at their mother. The teacher had offered prizes to all who attended regularly that term, and so far neither girl had missed a day.

"Nu, to school must the girls go, and little Stefan also," Mrs. Baucher declared. "In this country it is the law. If hot dinner you must to have, is not the cellar full of potatoes? Not a great cook need a man be to boil the potatoes."

Still grumbling, Ivan went to harness the horses to the big farm wagon, and Domka and her mother started just as the clock was striking six. Early as it was, the sun was already high in the sky, and there was every indication that the day would be very hot. But Mrs. Baucher knew that along the Saskatchewan there was sure to be a pleasant breeze. When they reached the ferry landing, where there was a shallow place suitable for laundry work, she unharnessed the horses, tied them to the tongue of the wagon, and gave them some hay which she had brought with her. Domka meantime waded out into the swift brown current with an armful of clothes, and the wooden bench and bat which took the place of tub and washboard.

The ferry barge, with two teams on board, was nearing from the opposite side of the Saskatchewan. With the usual bump the barge grounded and the teams went on their way. But the driver of the second, on seeing Mrs. Baucher, stopped his horses and called out:

"Dobra den, Natasia Nicolaievna. Yet you must to wash in such an old-world way? A well-to-do farmer like Ivan should to buy for his wife one of the new machines that makes clothes clean in no time at all. With such a machine, mine wife has the wash done very early, and no longer must I to eat a cold dinner every other week."

Mrs. Baucher replied with dignity, that when she marketed her lambs in the fall, she would perhaps buy such a machine as he described, which might prove useful during the winter months. "And good it is to hear, Tonassi, that your wife has now so many clothes that a machine she must to have to wash them," she added. "Not so was it in the days before you get to be cattle buyer. No work at all you do, yet more money you make it than the farmer, who must to work hard all the year."

Tonassi Stranatka changed the subject abruptly by asking if Ivan were at home. "I hear he wants now to buy hogs, and I have in mine wagon two good sows with small pigs."

Mrs. Baucher replied that her husband was at home, but that he had no money for pigs, having just expended all his ready cash in the purchase of a seeder.

"All same, I stop by your place and see him," Tonassi remarked, as he gathered up the reins. "Always there is chance that we make trade."

"Oi, an easy life them cattle buyers they got it," Mrs. Baucher exclaimed, as she gazed after Tonassi. Then she raised her bat high in air and began to pound the dripping garment spread over her washing stool.

Tonassi made various detours to look at cattle, so that it was somewhat after noon when he reached the Baucher farm. Ivan was just sitting down to his mid-day meal.

"Art just in time to eat," he said, as Tonassi, having tied his horses to the fence, entered the house. "Nothing is there but bread and boiled eggs, and some cold pork. No time I got it to cook for mineself the potatoes, and the women they go to wash clothes. Always must the women be washing and cleaning."

"Eggs and pork are always good, cold or hot," Tonassi rejoined, as he pulled a bench up to the table. "But a washing machine you ought to have it, same as I buy for mine wife. Then would the women wash at home in no time at all, and a hot dinner you get it every day."

"Sure, like rich man," Ivan rejoined sarcastically. "Hard enough it was yet to get the money to pay for mine seeder."

Tonassi clucked sympathetically, and inquired if his friend had no more grain to sell.

"Sure, I got yet plenty oats, but now are oats too cheap. I think I keep him short time yet."

"Them oats you should feed to pigs," Tonassi advised, as he broke the shell of a fourth egg. "When a man got a bunch of good pigs, quick he makes money."

Ivan nodded, as he poured another cup of scalding black tea for his guest. "Sure, a man can make money that way, but he must to have the pigs."

"In mine wagon are two fine sows with twelve little ones," Tonassi said, judging that the time had come to talk business. "In trade I get them from Moisey Shimka. Very cheap I sell—only a hundred and fifteen dollars for whole thing."

"And for me would fifteen cents be too much, since no money I got it," Ivan rejoined. "Once yet I told you that."

"Other things you got yet," Tonassi replied. "I show you pigs, and we make trade."

HASTILY finishing his fifth cup of tea, he led the way to his wagon. Ivan saw at once that the little pigs and their mother were good stock, and that the price asked was reasonable. But he only said that he would have been willing to offer eighty dollars for the pigs, except for the fact that he had no money.

"To-day I got no time for fooling," Tonassi said with dignity. "You not want buy, so I think I go now by Kosten Boicjuk's place."

"If a man no have money, what he can do?" demanded Ivan, spreading out his hands, palms upwards.

"Other things you got it. I see by the stable there some sheep with lambs. One man at Chernenowicz will buy from me sheep, so I make the trade. Twenty dollar I give you yet for one sheep with lamb."

"Five sheep I got it," Ivan said doubtfully. "That makes—twenty and twenty and twenty—"

"One hundred dollars it is," broke in Tonassi impatiently. "Not enough yet, but maybe you have something else—"

"The wool there is, that mine wife cut off but yesterday," Ivan said slowly. "But that money she want for her own self. The sheep, too, are mine wife's, so—"

"Nu, a man and his wife are all same one person," Tonassi argued. "Let me see that wool, and maybe we make deal."

The chaffering continued for the better part of an hour, but in the end Tonassi departed with the sheep, their lambs, and the wool, while the sows and their families remained behind in an improvised pen. When Mrs. Baucher returned with a wagon full of clean clothes, she took the news more quietly than her husband had hoped. But she had been brought in to believe that the man was the head of the house, and that though his decisions might sometimes appear unfair to his women folk, yet one must respect the world as it was. Life went easier that day.

Only to her mother-in-law, Domka, dare to express her indignation.

"People say they live in Russia in a free country, but it seems to me that there are the same as in Russia. What right had father to sell the sheep and have money?"

"No, no, my mother, it is not like a sheep. Much would I like to see my man sold from me, my property," Mrs. Lopatka rejoined.

It is a pity, with all her coming to Canada, twenty years before she had exposed several cases of corruption, and even noticed her own husband, during all the time of the war. By working early and late, and denying herself some of the necessities of life, she had lived through the first years of discouragement, with their crop failures due to drought and early frosts. Then the tide turned, and she found herself independent.

Although she continued to wear the peasant costume of her native land, Mrs. Lopatka was subjected of radical opinions on many subjects. She now lived alone in a small but modern bungalow, leaving her original log house, with its mud floor and thatched roof, to be occupied by her nephew, who now worked her farm on shares.

"No longer shall they go about looking like a 'proshok,' (beggar), the old lady continued. "Tomorrow then shall go with me to the town, and we will buy everything new, so that thou shalt look like other people when the Bishop stands in our church on Peter's Day. Nu, to me it will be nothing. Much money did I put in the bank last harvest, and none have I taken out again. No husband have I to spend for me mine money."

There are no seats in Russian churches, and at Varsovie it was the custom for the men to crowd together at the front, where they could hear well and have the advantage of being near the stove in winter, while the women, relegated to the space under the gallery, at the back of the building, were jostled by those going in and out, and had difficulty in catching more than the general drift of the sermon, since the acoustic properties of the church left much to be desired. On St. Peter's day, Mrs. Baucher, standing in the front rank of the matrons, had difficulty in keeping her mind on the service, so strong was the temptation to turn for another look at her Domka, standing modestly among the other girls at the very back.

"Like a school teacher lady she looks yet," thought the mother proudly. Then another distraction presented itself. At the end of the row, just behind her, Mrs. Baucher had spied her neighbor, Mrs. Olga Menzak, in a blue silk dress, with a stylish hat and high-heeled shoes. She even carried a pair of kid gloves in her hand, so that her neighbors might know that she had them, since it was too hot to put them on. Mrs. Baucher strove valiantly to attend to what she could hear of the Bishop's address, but in spite of her it would break away to wrestle with the problem of how Mrs. Menzak had been able to afford such finery.

Like a pastor's wife she looks, and she but a poor widow with a bushy farm," she remarked bitterly to Domka, as they waited after service for Ivan to get the team. "Nu, there goes her girl Katrina also, in a dress more pretty yet as yours, Domka."

"Katrina tells me her mother has found a way to make money," Domka explained. "Already she is secretary for five schools, and they each pay her fifty dollars a year."

"And only last week did the councillors make her secretary of the municipality, and she is to get six hundred dollars a year for nothing but writing a few letters and collecting the taxes," added Mrs. Lopatka, who was driving home with them.

"On or what a thing is an education," exclaimed Mrs. Baucher. "But will the government let a woman have good job like that?"

"In this country is a woman all same as a man yet," declared the old lady. "Look at me, with mine own bank book. But much I wish I had got the education when young. Much trouble it is to go to the bank and make money, mark if I wish to draw out the money. Olga Menzak can make money on a fine paper that she calls cheque, and in which one can get money for that paper. But maybe yet I learn to write, since here the government will not let me school this winter. You also, Nastasia, might learn."

"Never would Ivan listen to such a thing," exclaimed Mrs. Baucher, looking reproachfully at her husband, who had just come up with the team to see if he had overheard.

"Nu, if I wish to go to school, then I go," declared Mrs. Lopatka, as she climbed into the heavy farm wagon. "Good it is that no man I must to ask, each time that I wish to leave mine house."

SHE glanced belligerently at her son-in-law, but Ivan only said "Ged ab, you," to his horses. Talk of going to school, on the part of an old woman, seemed to him insanity, but he knew better than to argue with his mother-in-law. It was the teacher's place to tell her that the school was only for small children. Ivan had himself often regretted that he could neither read nor write, but one could not put back the hands of the clock.

The horses followed the oft-travelled trail of their own accord, and Ivan was able to give his whole attention to estimating the probable yield of each field of grain as they passed it. He thought he had never seen promise of a better crop, but of course there was always the danger of an early frost. He himself had sixty acres in wheat, and when they reached his farm he stopped the horses to admire the sturdy grain.

"I think more as thirty bushels to the acre I got it," he said. "After harvest I buy for thee the fine machine to wash clothes, Nastasia."

Mrs. Baucher looked pleased, but her mother exclaimed, "More as one washer can you buy for a hundred and fifteen dollars, Ivan." She had not forgotten the sheep.

Ivan pretended not to hear her; better let a woman have the last word than be forever bickering.

A month went by rapidly, and every time Ivan fed his plump, rapidly-growing pigs, or looked appraisingly at his wheat, just beginning to ripen, he told himself that Alberta was a good place. "Never in the old country could I get rich, like here," he thought. "Maybe even I build mine own new house next year, or buy the automobile, like Tonassi."

When, two nights later, an unseasonable frost blighted all the wheat, and seriously damaged the oats, Ivan's air castle was only one of the many that tumbled about the dreamer's ears. With Russian stoicism he and his neighbors resigned themselves to another year of saving and plain living, and began almost at once to plan for the bumper crop that would surely come next season.

So that Ivan had a note for machinery coming due, so that, much against his will, he had to face the question of marketing some of his pigs before they had attained their full growth.

"A pity it is," he remarked to a neighbor in the post office, "for Stranatka says that for a month are pigs going up yet."

Mrs. Menzak, who was now post mistress in addition to her other activities, said bluntly that Stranatka was a fool. "For what do pigs go up, when all the grain it is frosted? In such years every man wants to sell and none to buy."

"Nothing at all does a woman understand about business," said Ivan good naturedly, as he took up the mail order catalogue and the dunning letter from the machinery dealers which were his share of the weekly mail.

Mrs. Menzak shrugged and changed the subject. "There is here the petition for the night school," she said, laying a paper in front of Ivan. "Your name I write it here, and you must to make the cross beside it. And for the money you can to give your note."

"What for a foolishness is this?" Ivan demanded.

Mrs. Menzak, rather taken aback for once, explained that she had seen his mother-in-law the day before, and that the old lady had said that she herself, as well as her son and his wife, would attend the night school.

"Five nights a week it will be, and the pastor and his wife are to help the teacher. And only ten dollars must each one pay for the whole winter. But twenty people must sign, or the government will not start the school."

"Nu, grey-haired men should to pay ten dollars to go to school yet—not in Varsovie will you find twenty such fools," exclaimed Ivan, as he strode to the door. His friend, nodding approval, followed him.

When Mrs. Lopatka came in later, the post mistress said she was afraid the project would fall through. "Only sixteen names I got it, though I talk till my tongue hurts," she ended.

Mrs. Lopatka directed that her name should be written down, and then she carefully made her cross. "Now you got it seventeen names," she said. "To-night I talk to Ivan mine own self yet. With one hundred and fifteen dollars more as two people he can to pay for."

The post mistress did not understand the allusion, but she asked no questions. As she handed Mrs. Lopatka her mail order catalogue, she remarked that this year the mail order house was not likely to get as many orders as usual from Varsovie.

"Though that Stranatka is telling people to hold their cattle and pigs for a rise," she said. "I think he is one fool."

"Nu, what for a fool? Always Tonassi trade, so now he have much oats, much hay. So he say to all the neighbors, 'Wait yet for the big price.' Then when wee small price come, Tonassi say 'That too bad,' but he take them stock off other man, because he good neighbor. Then he feed them stock all winter, on that hay, and sell in spring for big money."

"A good head you got it, Mrs. Lopatka," exclaimed Mrs. Menzak admiringly. "Too bad it is that you have not the education, like me."

"Soon I get him," the other rejoined. "Ivan, he says always, 'Never can you put back the hands of a clock.' Better it is to say, 'Never too late to mend.'"

MRS. LOPATKA had to feed her stock when she got home, since her nephew was away, so that it was nearly nine o'clock before she found time to go over to her son-in-law's farm, to argue the matter of the evening school. When she reached there, she found that Ivan had left for town with a load of pigs. Mrs. Baucher explained that the dunning letter from the machinery people had made him uneasy, and he had decided to sell half his pigs, and settle the overdue account at once.

Mrs. Lopatka demanded a lantern, and when she had lighted it she went out to inspect the ten pigs that were left. At last she said that the old sow was somewhat thin, but that she estimated the total weight of the ten at about fifteen hundred pounds. "At seventeen dollars the hundred weight, how much?" she asked.

Domka, after a moment's calculation, gave the sum as two hundred and fifty dollars, but said she could not be certain until she had figured it out on a piece of paper.

"Enough it is," Mrs. Lopatka declared. Then she unfolded a plan whose sheer audacity took away the breath of her hearers. "Me, I keep the house and the children till you come back," she ended. "At once you must start. As soon as Ivan thou canst be home, seeing he went to Melton, while Borwick is five miles nearer."

"But—but Ivan would kill me, if I sold his pigs like that," Mrs. Baucher stammered.

"In Canada are such things not done," her mother rejoined calmly.

"Also, there is here nobody to load the pigs," Mrs. Baucher continued, catching at any straw that was likely to block her mother's daring scheme.

"O! oi, art thou and Domka fine ladies? Often have I loaded pigs, mine own self, and not yet am I too old for such work."

Under the spur of the old woman's will the pigs were soon loaded, and Domka and her mother, hardly as yet realizing the enormity of what they were doing, had started for Borwick. A fuller realization came with each mile that the horses trudged, but Mrs. Baucher dreaded her mother's anger as much as that of her husband, so she continued along the line of least resistance. Only the next day, coming home with two hundred and seventy-five dollars pinned inside her blouse—for the pigs had proved heavier than Mrs. Lopatka's estimate—did she begin to go over the arguments for the defence.

"Nothing did your father say to me before he sold mine sheep to that good for nothing Stranatka," she remarked several times.

When they reached home they found that Ivan had not yet returned. Mrs. Lopatka said that a neighbor had called to say that Ivan had not been able to finish his business, and would not be home until the following day. Mrs. Baucher hardly knew whether to be glad or sorry for the respite. It was after dark next night before Ivan came home; he was very tired, and after eating the supper which Domka had kept hot for him, he went to bed. His wife did not venture to ask how the pigs had sold.

Next morning, when he had finished a hearty breakfast, Ivan said he must go out and feed his remaining pigs. Mrs. Baucher, who had turned pale sought to put off the moment of discovery by asking how his load had sold.

"Two hundred and sixty dollars I got it," said Ivan complacently. "I said to mine self, for them pigs I get it maybe two hundred and fifty. So that is ten dollars more. You take him and go to school if you want, Nastasia."

As he spoke he unfastened two safety pins which had decorated the front of his overalls, and drew from its place of concealment a crumpled bill, which he handed to his wife. Then, before she could speak, he went on.

"One man, he say that machine company has now much trouble getting money from farmers, for that this frost come. That man say, if I pay all at once, I must to get the discount. So much I talk, and at last machine company give twenty dollar discount. Then in town I meet Stranatka, and bought from him that clothes machine, for eighteen dollars. This morning already Stranatka brings him, maybe."

Mrs. Baucher could restrain her feelings no longer. With a groan she buried her head in her arms.

"Nu, Nastasia, what has come to thee? Art ill?" her husband demanded anxiously. "Domka, find quickly that medicine left from last winter, when the children had measles."

"Only in mine heart do I feel bad," exclaimed Mrs. Baucher, motioning the frightened Domka to desist from rummaging among the countless bottles on the shelf over the window. "I feel bad for that I have been such a good-for-nothing. It is that I—I—"

Here there was a knock at the door, which opened to admit Tonassi. He looked somewhat disappointed when he noticed that breakfast was over, for he had the reputation of always arriving at a neighbor's house while a meal was in progress.

"Already is the washing machine outside," he said. "I say to mine wife, perhaps yet Nastasia has not done the washing, and if I take the machine now it may save her going to the river. Without mine breakfast did I start."

"Sit down, sit down, Tonassi, and Domka will get you something," said Ivan absent-mindedly. "Mine missis, she don't feel so good yet."

Mrs. Baucher, saying that she was all right, sat up and tried to compose herself.

"Nu, that is too bad," murmured Tonassi sympathetically. "As they say, the bad news she comes always together. This morning I hear by telephone that pig market blow up yesterday. Eleven dollars a hundred only, but that dealer he not want to buy now. He think they go lower maybe already."

Ivan's jaw dropped; he scratched his head the better to understand this appalling news.

"But—but only two days ago I sell half mine pigs at seventeen," he stammered.

"Like that the world goes," agreed Tonassi sympathetically. "But maybe I can help you out. I get some feed for trade, so I can to pay you ten dollars a hundred for them pigs; that saves hauling them to town."

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

Garth Pevensey, a young New York journalist, meets, in the North Country, Natalie Mabyn, whose mother-in-law asks him to conduct her safely to the Bishop of Miwasa. Garth undertakes the journey and Natalie informs him that she had been married years before to Herbert Mabyn, who had immediately vanished on a western journey and whose course, since then, has been an evil one. She, however, has promised his mother to find him. They meet Nick Grylls, a villainous character who falls in love with Natalie and contrives that they always miss the Bishop. They find a friend in the boy settler, Charley Landrum, and secure the boat, "Loseis," only to find Grylls on board. Finally a heavy storm overtakes them.

CHAPTER XI.

BEFORE him, the lightning luridly showed up the trees on the shore, writhing horribly; and the wet mast and the guy ropes were often wreathed in faint, bluish flames. The "Loseis" forward, with her irregularly piled cargo, and the crouching forms under the sail-cloths, presented a thousand shifting, fantastic shapes in the playing flashes; and Garth had a score of false alarms. In the end, his enemy crept almost upon him undiscovered.

By the light of a great blaze, which held all the earth and the heavens suspended in flames for a moment, Garth suddenly saw revealed a crouching figure, and a hideous, distorted face no more than six feet from his own. In the blinding glare it was outlined with a horrid clearness; in its grossness and bestial hatred, less human than demoniacal.

Garth, snatching up his rifle, sprang to his feet, but before he could point it, Grylls had flung himself upon him, and his mighty arms were squeezing Garth's ribs into his lungs. The useless weapon dropped to the deck. Grylls, trusting to his enormous strength, was unarmed; he wished to crush his adversary without leaving obvious traces of violence. No word was spoken by either.

They swayed on the narrow seat encircling the stern; and all sound of the little human struggle was swallowed up in the dreadful uproar of the elements. Natalie and Charlie, but three yards away, heard nothing. Grylls was the stronger; Garth contented himself with a dogged resistance, trusting to his better will to save him in the end. Meanwhile the "Loseis" was continually heaved under their feet, and dropped heavily on the stones by the mounting breakers; and they maintained a footing with difficulty. Nick ceaselessly strained to force Garth to his knees. Failing, he lifted him clear of the deck. At the same instant the boat lurched drunkenly; and they pitched overboard together.

Somehow, they gained their feet, and stood, still locked together, while the tumbling waves boiled around their waists, and sucked at their knees. But Garth had struck his head on the gunwale in falling; his senses were slipping away and nausea overcame him. He tried to cry out; but the feeble sound was lost at his lips. Nick forced him slowly down until the water broke over his head. Garth was dimly conscious of hearing him laugh—no one knew; and the explanation next day would be so simple! But the wholesome chill of the water rolling over his head revived the swooning Garth. He collected his forces for a last effort; and, suddenly wrenching his shoulders from under the hands that pressed them down, he gained his feet, and his hands seized upon Grylls's throat.

It was the big man's vulnerable point; and a subtle sweetness flooded Garth's breast as he felt him begin to fail. The smith's arms of him little by little softened of their steely strength; he strove in vain now to lift Garth off his feet. Garth, cool and strong again, and always waiting, let him tire himself. He disdained to call for help now; he even relaxed his grip.

Meanwhile the waves broke with ever-increasing violence on the frail bulwark the two bodies offered to their impetuous course, and it was only a question of moments when they would both be beaten down. Grylls's knees weakening under him first, down they went, Garth uppermost; and, the water seizing them, still gripped together, they were rolled over and over, and finally flung up on the stones.

Stunned, bruised and breathless as he was, Garth was still able to free himself from the automatic grip of the other man's arms; but Grylls lay motionless. Briefly satisfying himself that the man still lived, Garth dragged him out of reach of the waves, and letting him lie in the driving rain, turned his attention to the boat.

The "Loseis" was in a bad way. The waves under her stern had lifted the driven stakes as easily as pins are drawn from a cushion. She had immediately swung broadside on the beach; and the waves, crashing under her counter, were driving over her in clouds of spray while her bottom heaved, and gave, and pounded sickeningly on the stones. No one on board required to be told that a very little of this would separate every plank of her from her aged ribs. The breed boys appeared one by one from under the coverings; and standing about, dazed and careless of the downpour, waited to be told what to do. There was no sign of Hooliam.

Garth climbed painfully on board. Searching for the degenerate captain he stepped on something soft, and a hollow groan issued from beneath the sail-cloth. He threw it back, and dislodged the palpitating Hooliam. The breed struggled to his knees, supporting himself by a guy rope. Just then there was a blinding flash, and the mast and the wet ropes were wreathed again for an instant in bluish flame. Partly shocked, but more from abject fear, Hooliam collapsed with a brutish moan.

"Throw him ashore!" Garth commanded with strong disgust.

The breeds, understanding his gestures, instinctively obeyed; and Hooliam was dragged over the side, and dropped on the beach, not very far from the body of his unconscious employer.

"We'll have to save her ourselves!" shouted Garth to Charley. "Translate my orders!"

The storm had a revolving tendency; and the wind had now hauled to the south, whence it came shrieking across the lake with unabated fury. A little way ahead around the shallow crescent of the exposed bay in which they lay, they could see by the light of the frequent flashes a point on which the waves were beating wildly; and beyond there was a promise of smooth water and safety. It was only a little way, scarcely an eighth of a mile; but the way was beset with heart-breaking difficulties.

"All hands ashore to push her off!" cried Garth.

The breed boys, welcoming a voice of authority in that bewildering chaos, sprang to do his bidding. Garth and Charley set the example, and the ten backs were braced under the lee gunwale of the "Loseis," measuring their sinews against the crashing blows of the waves on the other side. They bulged her inch by inch, often thrown back again; but at last she floated, and there they managed to hold her for a moment, rising and falling. Only one who has measured the strength of the surf against the smallest craft, may comprehend the magnitude of their labor.

"Aleck's crew ahead with the tracking-line," shouted Garth.

The line is always kept coiled and ready, hanging on the bow. Aleck seized it, and followed by three others, ran ahead along the beach, paying it out. The four of them slipped into the harness; and digging their moccasined toes into the beach, painfully straightened their legs under the pull. When the "Loseis," answering, began to move inch by inch along the shore, Garth put the remaining men on board one at a time, where, armed with their poles, and braced almost horizontally, they held her off the stones.

Natalie had long since deserted her sheltered nook, and, heedless of the drenching downpour, watched them with eager eyes. Garth, his bruises forgotten, seemed everywhere at once; he had even time to shout a word of encouragement to her, and she longed mightily to do something to help. Looking around, she saw her chance. The steersman's long sweep lay along the deck; running it aft through its ring in the sternpost, and pushing with all her strength against the stones astern, she added her mite to keep the boat headed off. Garth observing, shouted his approval; and Natalie's heart waxed big in her breast.

Inch by inch, then foot by foot, they won their painful way along the lee shore. Over and over in spite of the six poles, she was thrown back on the stones, whereupon they all leaped overboard and put their backs under her lee. There was once when Garth's pole snapping short, he pitched headlong overboard. He climbed back and found another pole. Again, approaching the point, the four men on the end of the tracking-line crawling slowly around the edge of a steepish bank, were by a sudden heave of the "Loseis" all four jerked into the water. Instantly picking themselves up, they scrambled ahead with their line through the breakers. Garth's heart warmed over the half-fed, half-clad boys. Not one of the eight faltered for an instant, and in the midst of their superhuman labors they could still be shouting to each other.

A reef ran out beyond the point; and how they ever got over this, or how long it took, none could have told. By that time they were merely insensate machines striving automatically against a mighty inhuman adversary. The "Loseis's" ribs yielded and trembled under the renewed blows on the stones. Dizzy and blind with fatigue they struggled ahead; but they would never have made it, had not the wind hauled still further around. Finally a wave greater than any preceding lifted them clear of the stones, and dropped them into smooth water inside. For a while, unable to realize they had rounded the point, they continued to struggle; then the "Loseis" gently beached herself. The tracking crew scrambled aboard, and all hands dropped where they stood for a breathing spell.

Soon after the storm showed signs of abating. In the end it ceased almost as abruptly as it had begun; and the moon looked wanly forth, as if ashamed for the recent disturbances aloft. Garth, thinking of Grylls and Hooliam lying on the beach around the point, consulted with Charley what had better be done. It took them about three seconds to arrive at a decision.

"It is between eight and ten miles to the head of the lake," Charley said.

"Let them walk it then," said Garth coolly.

Presently the same breeze resumed its gentle course up the lake as if there had been no such thing as a storm. Tired as they were, it was too good to lose; and with hoisted sail, the "Loseis" forged through the rapidly subsiding waters, with Charley at the helm. The breed boys asked no questions. Having raised the sail, they promptly fell asleep. Hooliam they had little regard for anyway; and Grylls they may have supposed was still somewhere under the sail-cloths. In three hours they had reached Grier's point, the navigable head of the lake; and all hands slept until long after sunrise.

Garth and Natalie, meeting in the daylight, exchanged each at the appearance of the other: Natalie, with remorseful sympathy, that she had not sooner learnt the extent of Garth's bruises; and Garth with delighted wonder at the freshness of her. Natalie was like the lake in the early sunshine; neither showed the slightest trace of a storm overnight.

While they were at their breakfast on the shore, a deplorable figure, ashen-cheeked and shamed, came shuffling out of the bush. The eight breeds, as one, instantly set up a merciless, derisive jeering. It was Hooliam. He bore in his hands a little bottle and a bank-bill. Wretched as he was his own ally with satisfaction at the sight of the boat and second on the shore. He went to Garth.

"Nick Grylls in the bush," he said, dully pointing back. "Him and his. Makes him die. Him give five dollar for drink of whisky."

Garth filled the bottle from his flask. "Put up your money," he said softly.

CHAPTER XII

THE SHIPPERD NIGHT

THE Settlement lay about of three miles from Grylls point. Avoiding the houses for the present, Garth picked his camp outside, well off the trail. The first thing they learned was that the Bishop had gone on. This time they were not surprised, there seemed to be a fatality in it. The old problem confronted Garth anew.

"I think you should wait here," he suggested to Natalie, "and let me ride on for you."

Natalie, as she always did when this question was brought up, merely looked obstinate.

"It is likely we will miss him again at the Crossing," Garth went on; "and I have learned there are only one or two cabins there, and no white woman. It would be difficult for you."

Natalie's silence gave him no encouragement.

"But here," he urged, "you could stay with the wife of the inspector of the mounted police; while I go on and bring Mabyn back to you. I do not think you should put yourself in his hands."

"He would not come with you," she said evasively.

"I promise to bring him," said Garth determinedly; "if he is alive."

"No!" she said with manifest agitation. "That is another reason!"

"What is?" he asked mystified.

"I—I could not have any trouble between you," she said in a low tone.

"But I promise to bring him safely," he said doggedly.

She still shook her head.

"I will go to the wife of the inspector," said Garth—"a woman in such a position is sure to be the right sort—and I will explain our position frankly. She will be glad to take you in!"

Natalie shot an odd glance at him. "I will not let you," she said quickly.

"But why?"

"The risk of the humiliation of a refusal is too great," she said. "I do not doubt she is a good woman; I'm sure she rises splendidly to all the demands of her position here. But she has a position to maintain, you see; no doubt she is bringing up girls. And me!"—Natalie turned away her head—"consider how extraordinary the story sounds! Only one woman in a thousand would believe."

Garth turned a distressed face to her. "I have not taken care of you properly," he cried remorsefully.

Natalie veiled her eyes; and her hand stole to her breast. "Let us not talk about that!" she murmured unevenly.

Natalie recovered herself presently; and looked at him with a misty shine in her eyes. "Why do you worry?" she asked. "We're a thousand times better off than we were yesterday; for you have laid our enemy by the heels! Why mayn't I go on with you just the same as before? I cannot trust any one but you!"

How was Garth to resist such an appeal? Besides, there was nothing else to do.

Garth might have lodged a complaint against Nick Grylls at the barracks; but any investigation would have seriously delayed their journey; and a greater reason against it was his care for Natalie's good name. It was intolerable to him that the dear circumstances of their journey together should be made the subject of the common gossip of the North. It was better to let those who saw Natalie on the trail speculate as they chose, rather than give them an opportunity to put their own coarse construction upon the truth. He was well assured Nick Grylls would say nothing.

For the same reason, he decided to avoid the Settlement altogether. The two of them remained close in camp; and Charley was dispatched to purchase ponies and saddles, and what was needed to replenish their stores. He returned with all they required; and during the afternoon instructed Garth how to pack the ponies and "throw" the unmovable diamond hitch. Natalie in the meantime, constructed a divided skirt for herself, since side-saddles are unknown in the North.

Their route now lay over the ninety-mile portage to Spirit River Crossing. The road, Garth learned, was straight and for the North well-travelled. There were no forks or cross-roads; hence no possibility of their missing the way. They set off before daylight next morning. The parting with Charley was a wrench all around; but Garth was firm in insisting that the boy must go back, and put up his bay. In the early going North it is only too easy to drop one's toes and start off on a jaunt. Charley bade them an abrupt good-bye, and hustled away to bid his tears.

In the mystical gloom which, in northern latitudes, precedes the summer dawn, Garth and Natalie, each leading a pack pony, rode through the Settlement, which straggled for several miles around the shore of Moose Bay, a wide, shallow arm of the lake, once navigable, but now given over to the wild-fowl. The shacks were infinitely various; for in a land where every man builds for himself, a house quaintly expresses the character of its owner. But one thing was common to all; no one wastes any ornament on his dwelling; and in the luxuriant greenness of the northern summer, the grim, solid little houses were a reminder of the coming cold.

Later in the day they passed the long, gradual cliffs over the height of land separating the great watersheds of the Miwasa and the Spirit. On the other side they came to a flat country and of the same general character all the way. It was a sunny day, and, being young, they forgot their cares and rode gaily. For the most part the trail lay in a straight and lofty nave of aspen trees, rearing their slender, snowy pillars sixty, eighty—even a hundred feet aloft; and mingling their clusters of nimble, chattering leaves high overhead in the sun. There was nothing gloomy about this cathedral; the sun found a thousand apertures through which to launch his rays against the white pillars; while the green and mossy roof was bathed in almost intolerable radiance—it was a temple in green and white, Flora's colors.

Occasionally there were cloistered openings; sunny little meadows inclining to a spring, where the wild pea-vine, plant beloved of horses, and infallible sign of a rich soil, grew knee-deep. Such an opening they learned, however small, was quaintly dignified by the natives with the name of prairie.

Their ponies, each exhibiting a distinct individuality, afforded the excuse for their amusement on the way. Garth's mount, that a previous owner had christened "Cyclops," and who was tall

The Shepherding Night

By JAMES MABON.

The Shepherding Night came over the hill;
The wandering breeze grew fitfully still;
Till down the valley, and over the wheat
It hid in the meadow of silent retreat;
And a tender good-bye came floating to me
From the little bird up in the sleepy, old, tree.

The Shepherding Night is wistfully wise
And carries sweet balm for the sorrowing eyes;
The lingering touch of her soft finger tips
Makes a smile of the plaint on the murmuring lips,
And hearts that are broken, and spirits distressed,
Find calm in the fields of her sheltering breast.

The Shepherding Night has a wonderful way,
And comforts as only the motherly may;
She stoops to the valley, down, down from the peak,
Restoring the strong, as she strengthens the weak;
There ne'er was a bliss had a sweeter delight
Than the gift from the heart of the Shepherding Night.

The Shepherding Night comes down from the hill,
The lily cups close and the singers are still;
And over the river, companion of time,
She whispers a message that deepens the rhyme,
And the weary, in sleep steal away from the day
To peace in the shepherding shadows of gray.

enough and bony enough to be called a horse, was, like themselves, a stranger in the bush, and his face offered a comical study in anxiety, willingness and stupidity, under these new conditions. Natalie rode a young sorrel rejoicing in the name of Caspar. He had a dull eye, a long, sheeplike nose and a wagging under lip; and Natalie vowed he was half-witted. He would not ride abreast; but insisted on following; and he screamed with terror, if for an instant he lost sight of the other horses.

But it was the two pack horses that offered the most diverting study of character. When they left the Settlement behind, Garth cast off their leaders. In Emmy, a rotund little mare, they had secured a treasure. Emmy had an indifferent air toward them, worthy of a breed; but unlike a breed, she was thoroughly business-like. Where the great mudholes of unknown depth blocked the trail, and they must strike into the bush, she required no guidance. They laughed and admired, to see her stop, looking this way and that, and deliberately pick her way through, always with due regard to the height and breadth of the pack on her back. Emmy declined to be hurried; she had an air that said as plainly as words, if they didn't like her pace, they could leave her behind, and be hanged to them!

The remaining animal was Emmy's son, a half-broken colt, whose only virtue was that he would not stray far from his mother. Mistatimosis was his mouthful of a name. He forgot his pack sometimes, and striking it full tilt against a tree, would be knocked endwise in the trail, blinking and dismayed, as who should say, "Who hit me?" The thing that caused them the heartiest laughter was to see Mistatimosis's endless attempts to steal the leadership of the caravan from his mother. It was the only thing that could tempt Emmy out of her sedate pace. On a fair piece of road the two of them would race at top speed for half a mile; and the colt was continually making sly detours into the bush to get around his mother. But she kept him in his place behind.

The riders finding they could safely leave the pack-horses to follow, had ridden ahead to spy out grass and water for the noon spell. They were walking their horses over the turf bordering the trail, when suddenly from among the trees came with startling distinctness the sound of a voice. They reined up, astonished. It was the gentle, ambling voice of a loquacious old man; and his conversation there in the wilderness was as quiet and intimate as chimney-corner talk.

"I should say half-past eleven," they heard. "When Mr. Sun sits down on yonder spruce tree we'll make a break. So work your jaws good, Mother, old girl; and you Buck, my dear, stop looking around like a fool and get busy! Meanwhile, we'll pack up the grub-box."

Garth and Natalie smiled at each other. There was nothing very alarming about this.

"Will you have a pipe of baccy now, Tom Lillywhite?" the same voice resumed. "Thanks, old man, don't mind if I do! Is there any cut? No? Well, shave it close."

There was a pause here, while the speaker presumably filled his pipe. Then some one drew an audible sigh of content; and a kind of dialogue took place—though there was but the one voice full of quaint lifts and falls. Garth and Natalie, smiling broadly, listened without shame.

"Ah! a fine day, a bellyful of bacon, and a pipeful of tobacco!—would you change with a moneyed man, Tom Lillywhite?"

"Well, I don't know, sir! Mebbe he don't enjoy his grub as much as us, havin' gen'ally the dyspepsy; but how about the winter, old sport, when we don't fetch up no stoppin' house; and has to make a bed in the snow, hey? It's then a flannel bed-gown looks good to old bones; let alone woolly slippers and a feather bed! Seems I wouldn't kick agin the job of takin' care o' money in the winter time!"

"Ah! g'long with you, Tom Lillywhite! You'd a been dead long ago if you had money! Swore up and bust with good eatin', y'old epicoor! You'd be havin' a pig killed fresh every week if you had money!"

"Say, b'lieve I would cut some dash if I had money! I'd build me a house of lumber clear through, and I'd paint it all over, paint it blue! And I'd have sawdust on the settin'-room floor and a brass spittoon in every corner! 'Have a chair,' I'd say to stoppers, not lettin' on I was puffed up at all. 'Have a ten-cent seegar. Don't mention it! Don't mention it! I get a case full in every Fall!'"

Here there was a jolly chuckle.

Their packhorses joining them noisily, the dialogue was cut short.

"Some one comin'," said the voice.

Rounding the clump of bushes, Garth and Natalie found themselves in a grassy opening in the bush. An untraced wagon stood in the centre; and two horses browsed. Immediately under the bushes, an old man sat on the ground. They instinctively looked around for the other persons brought into his conversation; but, save for the horses, he was alone.

At the sight of them his face lighted up with the pleased naivete of a child. "How do! How do!" he said immediately, without getting up or raising his voice at all. "My horses are quiet. They won't tech yours. The spring is down there at the foot of the spruce. Just blow up my fire a little and it will do for you." He seemed to take them entirely for granted; and he spoke as if resuming a dropped conversation.

THERE was something very troll-like in the old figure, squatting on the ground; in his bright, glancing eyes, in his incessant, matter-of-fact loquacity, and the slight, peculiar gesticulation, with which he illustrated his talk. He was all of a color; high moccasins, breeches, shirt and cap were weathered to the same grayish-brown shade—and that much the color of his skin. Against a background of withered grass, only his white hair would have been visible. He was like some good-tempered, little familiar of the forest.

He stared hard at Natalie in his bright-eyed, impersonal way; and as soon as Garth, having made his horses comfortable, came to build up the fire, he started in with his questions.

"Where are you going?"

"Spirit River Crossing," said Garth.

"Thinking of settling?"

Garth shook his head.

"No, you don't look like settlers. Company business, maybe?"

"No," said Garth.

"Police? Gov'tment survey?"

"Private business," said Garth—his usual answer to the question direct.

Baffled inquisitiveness, vice of the kindest natures, made the old man's face ugly; and for a moment he looked like a wicked troll. For a little while he preserved an offended silence; but then, probably recollecting that he would hear the whole story at the Settlement, or simply because he could not keep still any longer, his face cleared, and he resumed his engaging, inconsequential babble.

"See that horse over there, the buckskin? Best horse I ever had! True buckskin! Mark the zebra stripes round his legs, Miss; and the black stripe on his backbone. You can't kill a buck; he's got more lives than a cat. I call the old one Mother; she's good-natured, she is!"

"You're a freighter, I see," remarked Garth as a leader.

"Sure thing, stranger! Tom Lillywhite and his team is known to every settler in the country! Been here thirty-five year; and always on the move! Never sleep in the same place two nights going! That wagon there, and the grub-box is my home. It's a variegated life!"

Garth bethought himself the old man would likely prove a valuable source of information. "You must know everybody in the country!" he said, feeling his way.

"None better!" said Tom Lillywhite, bridling with pride.

"Are there many white men at the Crossing?" asked Garth.

"Quite a crowd," said the old man; "eight or nine at the least. There's the two traders, and Mert Haywood, the farmer, and old Turner, the J. P., and the priest, and the English missionary, and the school-master; that's seven. Then there's old man Mackensie, but you wouldn't hardly call him a white man—smoked too deep, and squaw-ridden."

"Is that all?" said Garth, disappointed of his quest.

"Well, there's a sort of another. He doesn't regularly belong to the Crossing, but he comes in to the store for his goods once or twice a year. I forgot him—most everybody's forgot him now. It's Bert Mabyn."

Garth and Natalie pricked up their ears; and their hearts began to beat.

"I got good cause to know Bert Mabyn, too," continued old Tom innocently; while the other two listened still as mice, and apprehensive of disclosures to be made. "But that's all past. I don't bear him no ill-will now. He's a cur-us chap, a little teched I guess; but as pleasant a spoken and amosin' a feller as another feller could want to have with him on the road! Want to hear about him?"

Garth looked at Natalie dubiously.

"Yes," she said boldly.

"Well, it was three years ago," began Tom Lillywhite, with the zest of the true story-teller. "The Gov'ment sent four surveyin' parties in; and I had more'n I could do freightin' from the Settlement to the different camps. It was rough haulin', you understand, over the lines they cut through the bush, straight as a string over muskeg and coulee. You couldn't load over twenty hundred-weight, and sometimes you had to dump half of that, and go back for it. But right good pay, Gov'ment pay is."

"I needed another team bad, and I see a good chance to get one on credit from Dick Staley, with the wagon and all; but I couldn't get no white man to drive it for me. A breed, you understand, soon kills your horses on you!"

"Well, it might be I was settin' outside the French outfit, talkin' it over," he went on tranquilly, little suspecting with what meaning his story was charged for the two strangers; "when along comes a feller and asts for me. Say, he was a sight! He was wearin' black clothes, though it were a workin'-day; and all muddled and tore, showin' the skin under; and his coat was pinned across the neck, with a safety-pin 'cause he hadn't no shirt. He had a Sunday hat on, too—all busted. At the best he weren't no beauty; his teeth was out."

Natalie shuddered.

Garth, suffering for her, could not bear to meet her eyes. "Perhaps you'd rather hear another story," he suggested.

She braced herself. "No! Go on!" she said.

"Soon as I see him, I knew who he was," continued old Tom; "for I hear the fellers talk about a white man that took passage up from the Landing on Phillippe's boat. He let them pull him all the way; and when they got to Grier's point, he hadn't no money. They took it out of his skin; and say, when a white man is beat by a breed it's good-day to him up here! In a hundred years he couldn't live it down."

"Do you want to hire a man?" says he mumbling-like; he was too far down to meet your eye.

"Hum!" says I thoughtful, 'I want a man,' I says.

"You should have heard the fellers laugh at that! They still talk about it! 'Tom Lillywhite, he wants a man,' they say. It's quite a word in the country. 'Tom Lillywhite wants a man!'"

The old freighter went off into an interminable chuckling over the antique jest.

It was inexpressibly painful to Natalie to have Garth there, a witness to her humiliation; but she would not stop the story-teller, nor let Garth stop him.

"However, thinks I, you can sometimes make a man out of unpromisin' mater'al," he resumed. "And in the end I took him for his grub. That was Bert Mabyn. For three months I didn't regret it; he was used to horses, and was first-rate company on the trail. I didn't give him no money—said he didn't want none—but I fed him up good, and he soon got fat and sassy. I give him other things too. I couldn't stand for the poor wretch a shiverin' by my fire in his buttoned-up coat, so I give him blankets; and afterwards an outfit of clothes."

"What do you think was the first thing he ever ast me for?—a razor and a glass! And every day after that he used to shave himself—every day, mind you, if he was in the thickest part of the bush! And forever trimmin' of his nails, and polishin' 'em to make 'em shine! Wasn't that remarkable?"

"He was a great talker. Nights around the fire he used to tell me all about himself. Seems he comes of real high-toned folks outside; but went to the bad young. Said he come West three years before that again, full of good resolutions, which lasted just so long as his money. Since then he'd been a grub-rider 'round the ranches, and dish-washer in hotels, and, 'scusin' your presence, Miss, worse than that—but he hadn't no shame about it!"

"I liked the feller. He wasn't no good, but he had that persuasive way with him. And he knew so much more than me! You'd think a man 'ud feel shame to tell such stories on himself; but no! he'd make out as you ought to like him for bein' such a good-for-nothing waster; and by Gum! in the end you did! Never see such a feller!"

"Well, all summer we travelled, me and him; him always behind me on the trail; and I hadn't any fault to find. But come September I had a rush lot up to Whitefish Lake; and at the same time there was stuff wanted in a hurry in Pentland's camp, over on the Great Smoky. So for the first time we divided. I sent him to Pentland's over this very trail!"

"I got back long before he did. After a while word come from Pentland, where in thunder were the goods?" It was after the first snow before Mabyn come back. He was a wreck and the horses were just alive, and no more. He told a story how his wagon capsized in the river, and he lost everything; but the whiskey gave the lie to that. By and by we found he'd buried a keg of it, outside the Settlement. In the spring when it was too late to do anything, it all come out through a breed. Seems away up by Fort St. Pierre, he met one of them crooked traders, that sometimes sneaks across the mountains; and he sold him the stuff for a keg of rot-gut. When I hear that I was thankful he brought back the horses at all. The business near busted me; for I had to make good three hundred worth of groceries to Pentland; and sacrificed the second team, 'count of the shape they were in. That was what Bert Mabyn cost me!"

"Didn't you have him arrested?" asked Garth indignantly.

Tom shrugged. "What were the use of that? The inspector was after me to prosecute; but it was too late to get my money back, and put flesh on the horses—besides, I was too busy. Of course, it weren't just the same as robbin' me in cold blood," he added in the tone of one who must be fair; "for it were the whiskey, you see."

Natalie kept her face averted from the old man. "And what has become of this man since?" she asked, steadily controlling her voice.

"Oh, he hung around the Settlement, sponging on one and another till he were kicked out; then he come down to the breeds. It was a great honor for them to have a white man of any kind runnin' after them, you see, so they put up with him. Then he drifted West, up Ostachegan way; and lately, I understand, he's taken up a deserted shack he found on Clearwater Lake, away up on the bench there, northwest of the Spirit. There they tell me he lives all alone, but no one's seen him in a dog's age."

Garth and Natalie avoided everything beyond the merest commonplaces to each other until they were alone; and even after Tom Lillywhite, bidding them farewell, had driven off, chirping to his horses, it was a long time before either had the courage to make a move toward overcoming the ghastly constraint his story had caused between them.

"Haven't we heard enough?" said Garth quietly at last. "Need you go any further?"

Natalie in the interim had had time to pass her emotional crisis. She was very pale, and her eyes were big; but she was now calmer than he. "I have heard enough, surely," she said; "but after coming all this way it would seem cowardly, wouldn't it, to be satisfied with hearsay evidence?—and there is still my promise to his mother."

Her tone impressed Garth with the utter hopelessness of trying to dissuade her. "But how can I let you expose yourself to—to what we may find!" he groaned.

"I am not a child," said Natalie quietly. "And I shall not quail at the mere sight of ugliness." She turned away from him. "Besides," she added in a lower tone, "you know the worst now; and that was the hardest thing to bear—your hearing it I mean. No," she went on, facing him again, wistfully and valorously; "it promises to be very ugly, but then I undertook it, you see. I am going on."

They could not bear to meet each other's eyes; and miserably turning their backs, affected to busy themselves with small tasks. Natalie, quivering with the shame of the lash all unwittingly applied by old Tom, longed with an inexpressible longing to have Garth with a hint or a look assure her that he loved her, and so, thrusting the wretch Mabyn out of their charmed circle, restate her in self-respect. But poor Garth in his clumsy, masculine delicacy thought that to obtrude himself at such a moment would only hurt her more. He kept silent, and he averted his eyes, and Natalie, misunderstanding, tasted the very dregs of shame.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE NEWLY-MARRIED PAIR.

BUT on the bosom of that infinite prairie, which rolls its unmeasured miles north and west of the Spirit River, a last place of mystery and dreams, still unharnessed by the geographers, and reluctantly written down "unexplored" on their maps, two human figures were riding slowly, with their horses' heads turned away from the last habitations of men. The prairie undulated about them like a sea congealed in motion—but seemingly vaster than the sea; for at sea the horizon is ever near at hand; while here the very unevenness of the ground marked, and fixed, and opened up the awful distances. The grass was short, rich and browned by the summer sun; and it mantled the distant rounds and hollows with the changing lights of beaver fur. The only breaks in its expanse were here and there, springing in the sheltered hollows, coppices or bluffs of slender poplar saplings, with crowding stems, as close and even as hair. The leaves were yellowed by the first frosts.

The man rode ahead, slouching on, the back of his wretched cayuse, with eyes blank alike of inward thought or outward observation. He was not yet forty years old, but bore the cast of premature decay, more aged than age. What showed of his hair beneath his hat was sparse and faded; and of his visible teeth he had no more than a perishing stump or two left in his jaws. His discontented, satiated, exhausted mien, had a strange look there in the fresh and potent wilderness.

The girl who followed with a travoise dragging at her pony's heels, was, on the other hand, in harmony with the land. Of the extremes to which the breeds run in looks, she was of the rare beauties of that strange race. Her features were moulded in a delicate, definite harmony that would have marked her out in any assemblage of beauty; and the spirit of beauty was there too. There were actually pride and dignity under the arched brows—so capricious is Nature in shaping her wilder daughters—and in the deep soft eyes brooded, even when she was happiest, a heart-disquieting quality of wistfulness. She was happy now; and ever and anon she raised her eyes to the slouching back of the man riding ahead with a look of passionate abandon in which there was nothing civilized at all. She was slenderer than the run of brown maidens, and her clumsy print dress could not hide the girlish, perfect contour of her shoulders. In her dusky cheeks there glowed a tinge of deep rose; testimony to the lingering influence of the white blood in her veins.

Topping a rise, the man paused for her to overtake him.

"Here we are, Rina," he said indifferently. His voice was oddly cracked. His manner toward her expressed a good-humored tolerance.

The girl apparently was sensible of no lack—but the breeds do not bring up their daughters to expect tenderness. Her eyes sparkled. "How pretty it is, 'Erbe!' she breathed. "Ver' moch good land!" She spoke the pretty, clipped English of the convent school.

At their feet lay a shallow valley, hidden close until the very moment of stumbling upon it. In it was a sparkling slough but large enough to be dignified with the name of lake. It was something the shape of a gourd, with a long end that curved out of sight below, a very girdle of blue velvet binding the waists of the brown hills. At their stood in the middle of her sunny kitchen, tired almost to the breaking point. Dinner was at the irritating stage where the potatoes should be drained, the gravy thickened, the turnips mashed and the dessert given a final stir, and moreover how our good housekeeper will if one is to eat a piping hot, well-cooked meal, those things come so at once, and in the last minute. When one reads of the housewife jumping into her post-horn and looking her best to serve said dinner, she probably has not, like Margaret, a two-year-old Bobby on hand who had just left a shattering pile of pot lids across the kitchen floor and gone after them.

So Margaret stood, feeling uncommonly like spanking Bobby and throwing the dinner out the window. She did neither of course; she picked up Bobby and the lids, finding a less messy amusement for him, and proceeded with the dinner operations, not finishing though before the front door banged and Robert Summers appeared.

She turned her head to give him a rather absent kiss, and his salute seemed perfunctory too. Margaret glanced up from the stove. "Headache?" she queried.

"No—just tired; think I'll sit down for a minute or two since you're not ready."

Margaret said nothing. Tired—she supposed he was tired, but hadn't he been out all morning running the car in that splendid air, keen on business of course; but wasn't he a man, a big strong man, pursuing an interesting occupation that appealed to his brain?

Tired—supposing he had been washing dishes, cleaning potatoes and turnips, sizzling over a hot stove, with a run at the beds and floors thrown in, inside all morning except when Bobby bumped himself in the back yard occasionally. Why couldn't he see how tired she was? He was deep in his paper this minute. Margaret did slam things a bit, and Robert's brows drew together automatically. He hated racket.

Dinner—served at noon for convenience—was not a particularly enlivening meal. Bobby had his special menu in his high chair in the kitchen and required his mother's presence every now and then. Plates were changed of course, so Margaret spent about half the meal on her feet. Nevertheless, she felt better after dinner; she had been hungry as well as tired. With Bobby on his kiddy-car at peace with all the world, and Robert smoking blissfully in the pleasant sun parlor, she sank into a comfy chair and felt less cross than she had an hour ago.

She looked at Robert, once more deep in his paper. Was he more selfish than the usual male? He apparently took her and the housework as a matter of course, and yet Robert was a good sort, and he had tried as hard as any man could to get someone to help her. If only—only—she was not so tired, if there wasn't so much to do!

If she could just get away from both Bobs for awhile. Of course she loved them, but aching feet, and a protesting back did not tend to make the torch flame any higher.

Robert straightened up.

"Time to be off, old girl!"

The "old girl" touched a spark. Why couldn't he remember that she hated to be called that?

"Yes, and time for me to wash that beastly pile of dishes, sweep up the everlasting kitchen, undress Bobby, bathe him and put him in bed, get salad, fruit, and scones in shape for supper, and then have my own bath if I can manage to fall in to it. I'm due at a committee meeting too, and then you come in and say you're tired!"

Margaret had worked up to a real climax which would have been quite dramatic if the tears hadn't bubbled over at this point.

Robert Summers stood as though a cyclone had been let loose.

"But, Meg, I didn't know you felt this way—are you sick?"

Yes, sick of this every-day grind with a grump for a husband! and before he could catch her, Margaret had flown up the stairs and checked the lock of her door. Bobby still gaily rode up and down the garden path.

Robert Summers was rather an old-fashioned man for the 1920 standard, too old-fashioned possibly to have grasped the fact that women's nerves had speeded up with the speeding up of other world machinery. Pies, cakes, and cookies, washing, ironing and scrubbing had all threaded their way along quite smoothly in his mother's home, and it had never entered his ken as to how they had been evolved. Of course he had lost his mother in his early young manhood, and yes, when he thought of it she had always seemed tired.

MARGARET TAKES SOME TIME OFF

By MAY L. ARMITAGE

ILLUSTRATED BY MARION LONG

His brow knitted. Was Margaret hysterical, worn out, or was she really tired of him? To-day was certainly unlike her.

He had an appointment for one o'clock; so, he made no attempt at a reconciliation, just gave Bobby a hug and went thoughtfully out to the car. He had a business trip in mind for the next day. He pondered. His grip was at the office, unpacked since the last trip. He could stock up with extra collars, etc., go to-day instead of to-morrow and not bother Margaret for awhile. Would he, or wouldn't he?

So Margaret stood, feeling uncommonly like spanking Bobby and throwing the dinner out of the window.

Four o'clock found him at his desk with the decision made. He would. He wrote a special delivery: "Margaret, dear, you are tired I know, but not tired of your Bobbies. You just think so. You do need a rest though. I am off on Route A, at 5 p.m., will be gone three weeks. Here is a little check; I wish it were more. Pack Bobby off to Aunt Martha, and holiday, my darling, where and how you like. We'll pack up and go and board when I get home if you say so."

IN the meantime Margaret Summers had had time to stop the flood gates, wash her face, put Bobby to bed, and be thoroughly ashamed of herself. It was not often that she let go like that. The "old girl" and Robert's apparent indifference had tipped the balance, but she didn't mean a word of it, and as she kissed Bobby's rumpled curls, she reflected that he was worth all the tired nerves and sinews in the world.

And Robert was a good old thing, provokingly silent of course, but he was always there when it came to real things.

She was mean, cross, nasty, everything—what would she have for supper that would be a real peace offering, and just here Robert's special delivery arrived.

That opened the flood gates once more for the cheque was quite a generous one, and business had not been too good of late either. The "my darling" was such a comfort; why couldn't he have said that instead of the detestable "old girl" at noon? Good old Bob, he always found it hard to express himself except on paper. He would be boarding his train now, she couldn't even phone him, and suppose—just suppose that anything should happen to him!

Margaret took a grip on herself. No more tears or she would really be ill. She and Bobby had milk toast for supper, and then she ruminated.

What could she best do with her three weeks?

Bobby thought it great sport to have Mother all to himself and insisted on drying his mug and plate, and "helping" all he could.

Still Margaret pondered. She was continually rushing—what she needed was rest. Committees and social affairs claimed her. She was not the type of woman to live in the community and not take part in its welfare. She knew that she overdid, but if her home alone bounded her interests, how should she ever keep up with her husband and son? A lecturer once left something with Margaret that she never forgot, he had said that to be a good mother one must first of all be a good citizen.

Still she thought, how best to use this time that was absolutely her own? She glanced out at her high-boarded shady back yard. Her neighbor on either side was away, and a commons ran back of her. She gave a little sigh. Here would be rest and seclusion in her own back yard if she could only stay in it.

Her breath almost stopped—why not?

Gradually the plan outlined itself. She would play that she was two years old for three weeks. She and Bobby would fare and fare alike. She would forget the house, darning, mending, cooking, canning, telephone, letters, meetings, teas, everything, positively everything that made up the routine of her busy life.

There was the sun-parlor opening on the high fenced yard; this, and the hammock under the big tree would be her retreat. The milk-man and the bread-man called early, she would leave out the tickets. Her half dozen hens would not be taking a holiday, so there would be fresh eggs, and in her garden there were young vegetables. She and Bobby would wear their bathing suits, and she would rest, rest, rest, sun herself, make mud pies, read, relax, sleep when Bobby did—what a heavenly idea! It was actually bed time now, Bobby was getting heavy eyed.

She danced the small boy up and down. "Muvver and you, Bobby—a real holiday! Muvver's going to be a little boy too!" Bobby whooped with delight, at what he hardly knew. He made the rounds with Margaret as she pulled all the front shades, plugged the door bell, put up a notice for the postman, which would also be a hint for callers—"Please hold all mail till the 30th inst.," called Central and asked to have the phone disconnected temporarily, and chuckling, wondered how her various friends would take it.

"Not that I'll even exert myself to wonder," she murmured as she let herself into a tepid bath, a slow delightful affair that rested every tired nerve.

Morning, with its brilliant sunshine brought Margaret up with a start. Robert would be late, and then she sunk blissfully down again in recollection. The oatmeal was in the fireless cooker, the cream was on the doorstep. She and Bobby would eat it, put their bowls under the tap and then the garden. When Bobby began to make little chuckling and gurgling noises intimating that he was awake she hunted out her bathing suit, re-braided her hair in a smooth plait down her back and went running in to him in her sandals. "Bathing suit, Son; you can turn the hose on Muvver after breakfast if you want to!"

They flew down stairs. The darkened house showed no dust and Margaret was not looking for any anyway. The morning sped in one lazy delicious dream. There were real mud pies, soakings with the hose, drying at full length by the mignonette bed and when Bobby said "Din-din time," Margaret pulled some young carrots, turned the hose on them and put them to simmer over the gas. Creamed carrots, soft poached eggs, bread and butter and milk were ready in no time, and when Mother and Bobby both gave a sleepy little sigh, the plates were once more put under the tap and off for the afternoon nap.

"I wonder how many days I can do this," thought Margaret, as she dozed off. "It seems as though forever would not be too long now. Someone's trying to ring the front door bell," she chuckled as

A Breezy Description of An Expedition from Edmonton Eastward OUT OF THE NORTH

By JANEY CANUCK

IT is September of a morning, when we pull out of Edmonton—throned Edmonton of Alberta—for a run down and across the seven Provinces of Canada, to stop here and there for a conference or two, but notably for the Canadian Women's Press Club and the Directors' meeting of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada.

Sirs, what a morning it is—almost like a chime of laughter. If these things were communicable through the medium of paper we would tell about the shine of the sun on the river, of the super-subtle air, and of how the trees stand closely on the fields like herds of tawny horses.

Besides, if we tried to set this down, we are afraid you might laugh at us. To understand the delights of an ever-widening world, with never a telephone between earth and sky, one must have been shut up in an office for months upon months. Ah, well! you can laugh if you care to. We are Cocks of the North, and we don't care who knows it.

At the edges of the city, the people are gathering in their potato crops, the children helping for awhile before going to school. Anyone can see that the trouble with picking potatoes lies in the fact that you are too close to your work.

We have fourteen thousand plantations of potatoes this year in our city, which must be pretty nearly a plantation for every householder.

But Edmonton has always been famous for its tubers. As far back as we know, the first garden was planted a hundred and sixteen years ago, that is to say, in 1804, by Henry Harmon, a factor of the North-West Fur Company. He tells in his diary that he planted potatoes and garden seeds on May 23rd, a month after the ice passed out of "the Sissicatchwin River." In October, he reports that his nine bushels of seed had given a yield of one hundred and fifty bushels, and that he is now assured of a comfortable subsistence.

It is well he planted those potatoes, for, that winter, food was so scarce in the district an Indian woman—in spite of popular prejudice against the habit—killed and ate fourteen of her friends and relatives.

Indeed, it is set down in the reports of "the Gentlemen Adventurers of the Hudson's Bay Company," that two Indian women devoured two white men from the fort, having accompanied them on a winter's journey.

The women told afterwards that one man's flesh was pleasant to the palate, but that the flesh of the red-haired Scotsman tasted of tobacco.

Out by the potato-patches, men are at work demolishing the penitentiary and have exposed row after row of cells to the air. These are joined together like the cells of a honeycomb, which is the only particular in which they approximate the yield of the hive.

Once, I went to see a woman in this jail, who was condemned to be executed, but whose sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. She was here for shooting a young woman who had won her husband's affections so that he turned her, (the old wife), out of the home.

I went to tell her that her husband had died the day before—that he had been caught in a belt of a machine and whirled and whirled around until all his life was beaten out—to ask her wishes about the estate; and how she wanted his personal effects disposed of.

One falls a-marvelling that Fate should trip up a woman with so wry a joke as this, and it is no wonder she could not understand aright, for you see this woman had never really owned a thing before. She could not comprehend what it meant to be the heir, and I could not explain because she had lost her rights as a citizen of Canada. We are foolish poor things, we women, and all we could do was to cry together. Sing woe, woe, and alas!

This was years ago, and now the woman has grown very old. Just awhile back, in the folly of my heart, I wrote to the Lords of the Council, that they let her go free, and to that farm where her adopted daughter awaits her coming.

Maybe, some day, a practical person will pray about this thing, and then we will see what happens.

THERE are other things to be seen on the edge of the city, where the yellow Saskatchewan loiters along with not so much as a wheel to turn.

Among these is a coal-mine, for Edmonton is encircled by mines. For that matter, if you care to sink your cellar deep enough in any part of the city, you will come upon several seams of coal.

It is passing strange to read concerning the household and industrial tragedies that threaten the southern provinces of Canada when an embargo has been placed upon coal from the United States, or when a strike has occurred in the American collieries, in view of the fact that the Province of Alberta possesses one-seventeenth of the coal of the world and that our mines are frequently shut down for want of orders.

Or if orders come with a rush in the autumn or early winter, when the railways are hauling our grain to the head of navigation, the miners must, perforce, be left off because no freight cars are available.

Or if freight cars are available, and orders have piled up in a manner wholly satisfactory to the Company, then do the miners drop their tools and ask for a dollar a minute extra. In this event, there is nothing left for the manager but to "use language," or to go out and graze like Nebuchadnezzar, the King. Managers do not like grass.

This is why, up to the present time, coal-mining has been more or less precarious in this Province. Some people have invested in coal mines and escape in the nick of time. Among those who did not escape was my own family. I lay my hand on my heart and assert that we did not.

When everything else had been conquered, the Saskatchewan River found an opening and flooded out the whole works. Bread may be cast on the waters, or almost anything else, and be found again after many days, but with coal it is wholly different.

Dr. Macphail pointed out that the main concern of the race is to keep itself warm, and that for our very existence Canadians are dependent upon coal. This is why it is highly important that Railway Corporations and Boards of Arbitration should give the closest possible attention to the coal resources of Alberta which, in view of their enormous extent, must ultimately become our basic industry.

Another industry carried on in the city is that of sheep-herding. The herder is a tall man of perfect strength, in no wise comparable with those "woeful shepherds" whom the poet bids to "Weep no more! Weep no more!" Shepherds nowadays receive handsome pay cheques, which probably accounts for their dry eyes and upstanding physiques.

This man is herding sheep for the packing plants nearby, and consequently has a change of flock every day or two, so that all the similes concerning shepherds fail here.

Once I stood by the chute of the packing plant and watched Old Billy, an Angora Goat, who decoyed the sheep up the incline, at the head of which they would be slaughtered.

Up and up they went—each of them a poor woolly idiot—terrified by the smell of blood but still following on after the leader, all the while "bleating blindly towards the knife of death." I might easily moralize about this if the readers had not already forestalled me, by framing their own deductions.

At any rate, after seeing this, one quite understands why goats could only be tolerated on the left hand, although it is questionable whether the sheep are not too stupid to appreciate the honor of being delegated to the right.

Once there was a Greek philosopher who wrote a good deal about goats, and he said that they breathed through their ears instead of their nostrils. And maybe they do, seeing that wasps sting with their tails, and men think with their digestive organs.

... But they were the sights we were talking about when led to talk of sheep and shepherds.

Having left the city, our train passed through fields of fallow with their fat black soil; fields where the "green feed" has become yellow; past lakelets aflush with teal and mallards; and through white forest of poplars in which any white-skinned nymph might escape from Pan if she had a mind to. Once, we pass a new steading where the house clings to the soil, like a grey barnacle by the sides of which half a hundred sunflowers lift their royal, loyal heads.

A man may feel lonely in a cabin like this, and hate his companion, but it is treachery to the laws of the North to say so.

Sometimes, we come to a firesmitten area where the flames have eaten the life out of the country. A camper or careless smoker, has left a cancerous patch in the grass that smouldered and grew into flame, leaving in its wake these weird tormented trees that seem to hold wild hands to the sky. Someone has computed that twenty-nine trees are destroyed by fire for every one that is cut by the axe, in view of which fact men should not be allowed to carry matches at all, even in the face of their possible starvation.

The Importance of Wall Paper in the Decorative Scheme of the Home

An excellent example of Chinese Chippendale design showing the Chinese influence on the French art of the period. The design which combines old rose and delicate shades of tan is printed on a royal blue ground. In five yard rolls, 30" wide, this paper is sold for three dollars and a half a roll.

Seriously Considering the Four Walls of a Room

A tapestry design of Flemish origin. It has a very "cloth" appearance and a delightful iridescent effect is obtained by a metallic thread overprint, which is hardly discernible in reproduction. The colors combine blue, gold and shades of terracotta, suitable for halls or lower floor rooms. The price is one dollar and a half a roll.

IN tracing the history of wall-decoration and wall-covering back to the early centuries, an interesting comparison is brought forcibly to the mind, and that is the difference in the modern mental attitude and that of the Greeks and Romans in approaching this form of elaboration of the home. Wall-decoration was not to them an ephemeral matter, to be made to-day and destroyed to-morrow—they produced for permanency, to withstand the centuries, and created beautiful masterpieces of art for their walls to be enjoyed by generations to come. It is amusing to imagine the horror of a Roman citizen of the Fourteenth Century could he contemplate the work of the modern paper-hanger as he carelessly drops a sheet of paper from ceiling to base and nonchalantly proceeds to affix it to the wall.

In remarkable contrast to this was the manner of decoration employed five or six centuries past, when it was thought time well spent to devote months and even years on the elaboration of the walls of rooms. One of the interesting mediums used in those days was a hard stucco, of the making of which the Greeks and Romans possessed the secret. This was creamy in color and was capable of receiving a bright polish like that of marble. It was used both on interior and exterior walls, and in the former case was made rarely decorative by the modelling of figures, groups and ornaments in delicate relief before the composition had time to set. Stucco was also used for interior decoration to some extent in England, and a few examples of Sixteenth Century houses thus treated still exist.

The vogue for black in the modern wall-coverings makes this paper particularly desirable as the design shows birds of beautiful plumage and flowers in exquisite coloring against an effectively striped black and white ground. A charming paper for a child's nursery or bedroom in a quaint design drawn by the well-known originator of child subjects, Kate Greenaway. This paper has the additional value of being sanitary and practical for it is possible to wash it, the colors being printed in oil. One dollar and a quarter a roll.

Stamped leather, made from skins of goats and calves, was the magnificent form of wall-hanging used during the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, the skins being tanned and cut in rectangular shapes and covered with silver leaf, this latter being varnished with a transparent yellow lacquer making the silver look like gold. The leather was then embossed and hand-painted in

A Policy of "Preparedness" Ensures a Garden of Spring Satisfaction

A Corner of Farm Vegetable Garden Containing a Little of Everything from Corn to Summer Squash.

Different people has different opinions
Some like horchids; some like hinions."

THIS quaint old English saying aptly illustrates the title and the theme of this article. To speak of orchids and onions in the same breath may not be considered good taste in some society, but what else should one do when addressing a cosmopolitan gardening audience? Some persons think of gardening only in terms of flowers; some consider only vegetables; some prefer fruits; others combine all these in little or great variety. There are commercial gardeners, professional gardeners, amateur gardeners and beginners. There are indoor gardeners and outdoor gardeners, public gardeners and private gardeners, farm gardeners and city gardeners—all sorts of gardeners. To write in one article something on gardening that will appeal to each and every one, a medley of thoughts necessarily is required. So, there you are! As the gardening season is again in the air, suggestions at random on work and preparation in March may be useful.

Foresightedness in gardening is a virtue supreme. The best gardens of summer are planned long in advance of the season. The best results are secured by ordering supplies ahead of time for use. Even the greatest pleasure to some folks is this planning and preparing in winter and early spring.

Seed and nursery catalogues should be secured and marked for selections. The reading of these is in itself an education. By ordering early, one is reasonably assured of getting the best in plants and trees and seeds of the kinds desired. And these things will be on hand when wanted. The gardener thus has a better chance to see that the right things are planted in the right way and at the right time. Order also tools, fertilizers and spraying materials.

Preparing for Vegetables.

THE beginner often asks "How early in the spring can I safely make my garden?" The question is founded upon the supposition that along in spring there comes a day when it is best for gardens to be planted, irrespective of the species of plants that grow in them. Not infrequently it is customary to take a day off to make the garden. In the country, the idea is that, once this troublesome job is out of the way, it will no longer interfere with farm work. The fact is, that there is no best day on which to make a garden, but there is a proper time for the planting of each kind of vegetable or flower to be grown. In most parts of Eastern Canada, vegetable gardens often are started too early. There is nothing gained by planting during a warm spell in March, for instance, which may be followed by cold damp weather in April. Gardens sown and planted in the open in May, usually do better than those started earlier. The one way to get quick results and early maturity in crops is to start the seed in a hotbed. Where only a few plants are wanted, seeds may be started in boxes or pots in a warm place in the house.

A hotbed may be started any time this month. Where a pit has not been prepared beforehand, a simple method is to make the hotbed over manure placed on the surface of the ground. Collect unheated manure from a horse stable and see that the manure has mixed with it an equal amount of straw that has been used for bedding. Fork this over well, pile in a heap and let stand for a couple of days. When it starts to heat, turn it over every day or so until well heated throughout. Then place it outside for the bed, taking care to tramp it down evenly in layers as put on. Use plenty of manure, so that the bed will extend a foot or so farther on every side than the dimensions of the frame, and have the bed about two feet deep. Put the frame on the bed and cover with sash or heavy canvas. When the manure is again well heated, cover inside the frame with four or five inches of good garden soil. After standing for two or three days, rake the surface of the soil and the bed will be ready for seeding. Among the vegetables to start in this way are tomato, cabbage, cauliflower, Brussels sprouts, celery, pepper, egg plant and melon. After the seeds are sown, proper attention must be given to watering and ventilation.

Cold frames are used in much the same way as hotbeds, but they have limitations due to lack of bottom heat. They are used, among other things, for "hardening-off" plants that have first been grown in a hotbed.

To Have Good Seed.

IT is not necessary nowadays as it was some years ago for the gardener to watch for impurities in garden seeds or to test for germination. Reputable seed houses exercise great care in cleaning their seeds and in testing for quality. But the need is important in the case of seed on hand from last year or longer. Some kinds of seed usually will not grow when over two years old; these include sweet corn, onions, parsnips and salsify. Some kinds, such as endive and cucumber, are good for ten years or more. All the other kinds of vegetable seeds range in longevity for various periods of years between these extremes. It is always well to test old seed for germination. There are a number of ways. Essentials are a steady and sufficiently high degree of temperature and a proper amount of moisture. Ordinarily the work can be done in the kitchen or in some room where the temperature is kept from 60 to 70 degrees without interruption.

The simplest method of testing is to place blotting paper on an ordinary plate and sprinkle on it a definite number of seeds from the package to be tested. Place one or two sheets of blotting paper on this and apply water to keep the paper and seeds nicely moistened. A second plate or pane of glass can be laid over all, to keep the moisture from evaporating. Do not permit the seeds to dry out. And be careful that too much water is not added. After from four to twenty days, depending upon the kind of seeds being tested, count the sprouted ones and determine the percentage of seeds that have life. Under good conditions, the average time for garden seeds to germinate is as follows:

| Kind of Seed. | No. of Days. |
|---------------|--------------|
| Bean          | 5 to 10      |
| Beet          | 7 to 10      |
| Cabbage       | 5 to 10      |
| Carrot        | 12 to 18     |
| Cauliflower   | 5 to 10      |
| Celery        | 10 to 20     |
| Corn          | 5 to 8       |
| Cucumber      | 6 to 8       |
| Endive        | 5 to 10      |
| Lettuce       | 6 to 8       |
| Onion         | 7 to 10      |
| Pea           | 6 to 10      |
| Parsnip       | 10 to 20     |
| Pepper        | 9 to 14      |
| Radish        | 3 to 6       |
| Salsify       | 7 to 12      |
| Tomato        | 6 to 12      |
| Turnip        | 4 to 8       |

The sprouting test is not always the last word respecting whether or not a certain lot of seed will produce plants, but it is a good guide. Many times seed will sprout and not have enough vitality to develop strong, healthy plants. Gardeners who desire a further test must grow the seeds in a

* The dates mentioned for planting give much latitude. The actual time depends upon climate and seasonal conditions in part of country located. "Early Spring" means as soon as the ground is ready, and indicates time for first planting, with some vegetables successional plantings should follow.

† The variations in distances and in time required for maturity allow for differences in varieties and in methods of culture.

‡ Should be started earlier in hotbeds or in boxes in the house. Amount of seed suggested for sowing is for this purpose in these cases. For number of plants to set outdoors, divide length of row by distance required between plants in the row.

Have a beautiful skin

Follow these simple directions

You must give Nature the aid she needs in keeping the skin pores active. This means washing your face and washing it thoroughly, regularly, every day.

Cold cream alone won't do—you mustn't depend upon it entirely for cleanliness. It catches dust and helps fill up the tiny pores instead of cleansing them.

You needn't be afraid of the effect of soap on the skin—not if your soap is right. Use Palmolive and make washing a daily beauty treatment.

Palmolive is the mildest of soaps and the gentlest of cleansers. Palm and Olive oils—ingredients of Palmolive—were ancient Egyptian cosmetics. Cleopatra used them as beautifiers as well as cleansers.

Use your two hands

This mild, gentle soap produces a profuse creamy lather which you should apply to your face with your two hands.

Massage it softly into your skin, so as not to roughen its delicate, sensitive texture. Then just as gently rinse it away.

It carries with it all dangerous, clogging accumulations—the dust and oil secretions, the remains of the day's rouge and powder. It leaves your skin healthfully, thoroughly clean.

Keep that school-girl complexion

A fine and fresh complexion

The gentle washing and rinsing stimulates minute glands and capillaries to beneficial action. This keeps your complexion fine and fresh and encourages natural, becoming color.

Be liberal with Palmolive Cold Cream if your skin is dry. Apply it before washing and again after, and your skin will be beautifully smooth.

Why Palmolive isn't 50 cents a cake

If made in small quantity it would be. We can't make it better.

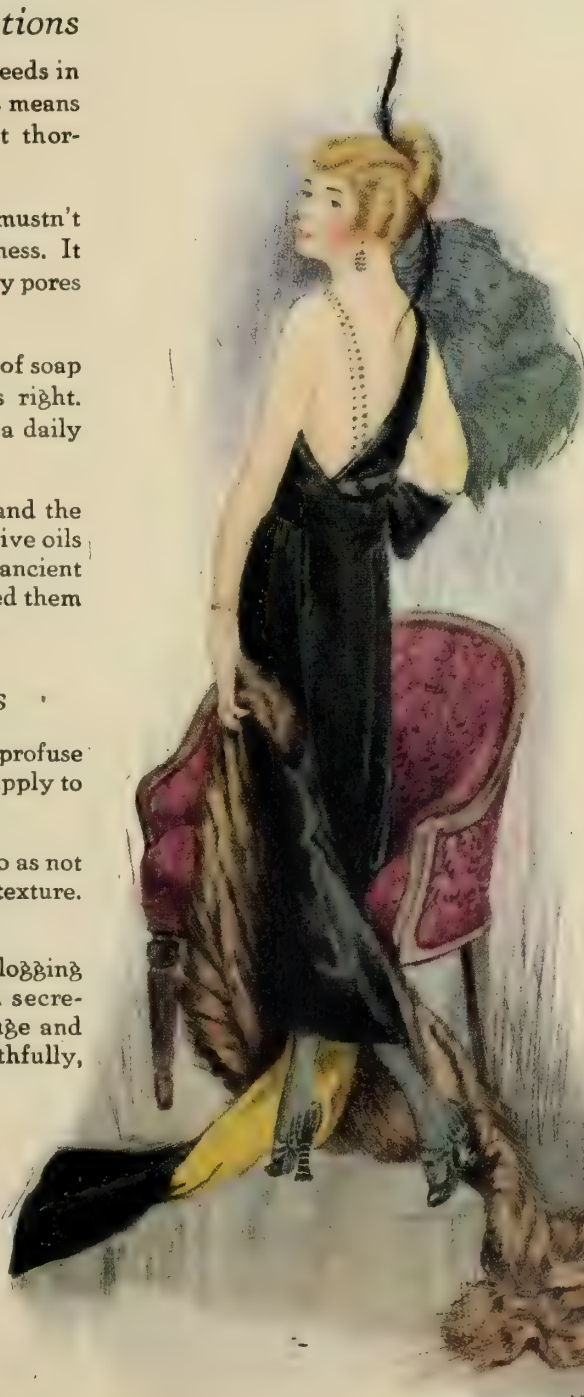

The gigantic demand for Palmolive keeps the price moderate. It keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night, which reduces manufacturing cost.

It permits the purchase of the costly oils, imported from overseas, in such vast volume that the price is much reduced.

Thus Palmolive is popular priced—no more than ordinary toilet soaps.

It is for sale by leading dealers everywhere and supplied in guest-room size by America's popular hotels.

EASTER MILLINERY

Reflecting the Beauty and Freshness of Springtime

By CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

CLOSE your eyes, give to your imagination the wings of an aeroplane, soar away and arrive at a tropical garden at noonday, drink in its brilliant beauty, then transfer the gorgeous scene to a millinery parlor, and you have some conception of what you will see at the spring millinery openings, at least what those will see who are privileged to visit millinery parlors in fashionable centres. The shapes aren't exactly what you might call rational—not all of them. But then, nothing is quite rational now-a-days, if we judge by pre-war standards, so, no matter how extreme they may be, they will not be out of harmony with the general disorder of mind and matter. If a turban with a balloon-shaped crown in a state of semi-collapse spills loops of ribbon out over one ear, the thing to do is to accept its eccentricities with any complimentary superlatives you may have handy and never mind tracing its ancestry, although some do say it is Egyptian and others contend that it is Spanish.

The high coronets we heard so much about last year never really came to pass in this conservative land of ours, which just shows what an important place we do occupy on the map, for Fashion has stopped her train and is waiting for us to take them up this year. Shapes that are short from back to front and quite broad across have high coronets, draped with ribbon, fabric, some fancy straw or substitute for straw or gaily colored blooms in massed formation from ear to ear, dripping ribbons, bangles, beads or perhaps a trailing tassel made of ostrich flues tied together and grouped in strands, caught at the bottom and weighted down with a glass or composition pendant.

BUT according to that celebrated Celt, Pat, (or was it Mike?) everything has its compensation, and if we have bright and trying colors in our headgear, beautiful as we must acknowledge they are, for never has millinery worked with more beautiful shades than are used this year, there is the subduing influence of the veil that falls over the edge of the hat, half revealing and half concealing what nature or the beauty doctor has done for the wearer. Also, there are the long chiffon or Georgette scarfs with one end safely attached and the other wandering vagrant-like, at will. The hat that hasn't a veil or a scarf, simply isn't to be considered for spring, by the ultra-fashionable person, be she young or old.

Having gone thus far without mentioning the status of feathers in spring millinery, it will be as well to rectify the omission without further delay. It is predicted that they will be almost on a par with flowers. In fact, some hint that they will be above par. Coq feathers are given a chemical treatment which sends them out into the world masquerading as paradise, the sale of which we all know is prohibited in Canada as well as the United States, and ostrich feathers are made up into pretty fancy mounts, limp plumes that spread themselves over the brim of a poke bonnet and glycerined and burnt ostrich that are used in many different ways to enhance the beauty of Easter models.

IT does not look now as if we should see many really voguish hats made entirely of straw until summer, if one except the sport sailors which will be worn with street suits for early spring, and even in summer, Fashion announces she will continue to employ fabrics in all sorts of unusual ways. Just now hats are composed mostly of taffeta, satin, crepe de Chine, Georgette crepe and ribbon, either alone or with some of the fancy straws and braids already mentioned. Anything with a shiny surface goes this spring. Ribbons are waxed and cellophane is woven into braids and many of the fancy straws glisten like water in the sunshine. But, fortunately, these are seldom used alone. They are combined with some of the aforesaid fabrics. For instance you stand over a hat and look at it from the top and conclude it is all-satin, but just peep under the brim and you will find it has a facing of some kind of straw or braid, or just for a change it may be faced with alternate sections of ribbon ruffles and colored sipper straws arranged in geometrical design. One of the hats in the picture, the sailor, is a good illustration, a Georgette covered shape with fancy straw draped around it—there you see is another demonstration of the sweet inconsistency of this season's styles, instead of a straw hat draped with Georgette, it is the other way around. But then why not? Isn't the one way just as rational as the other if we only think so?

Except the pokes and some of the sailor shapes, the obvious function of the hats this season is to frame the face instead of shading it. One would almost suspect the millinery and beauty parlors of forming an alliance for mutual benefit, because it will certainly be necessary to requisition the magic of the beauty doctor if we are to be presentable in some of these off-the-face shapes banked with bright colored flowers or draped with equally bright fabrics or lustrous cellophane, the latter coming back again this year with a much better character for durability and service than it left with last spring.

Now, I have written of the more extreme modes of millinery, such as we shall see at the millinery fact that it was made of lace, and for summer there'll be nothing more acceptable for garden parties than a chapeau made of lace. Even now there are quantities of lace being fashioned into the most alluring millinery, especially black and brown for early wear.

And speaking of color, while we find flowers and drapery of brilliant hue, the fashionable shade of the moment is grey—a light silvery grey that throws out glints of light. Other quiet tones that are found in spring millinery are caramel, beige, black and navy. The high tones are rusty reds and coral pinks, peacock, turquoise, ocean and jade, Chinese orange and royal blue.

THE psychology of veils is well worth the study of every woman, even her who proudly boasts indifference to personal appearance. The veil has marvellous potentialities. Many an acknowledged leader of fashion owes much to the veil that drifts over her hat or the one she films across her face and ties neatly around her turban, confining would-be excursive locks to their appointed place.

According to present ideals, face veils are a little difficult with large hats. They do not look well tied over the brim, which is usually too supple to support them, but a large hat offers wonderful opportunities for the large drape veil with its spotted chenille border or embroidered motifs. And one might say as much for turbans or hats with narrow brims. In fact, the rather severe silhouette of many of the small hats almost demands a softening background such as a filmy veil affords, and prettily draped, it adds at least fifty per cent. to the chic of the costume as a whole. Large flowing veils of all kinds are among the spring offerings, and for face veils, there is something delightfully new and pretty. Small chenille spots are placed at regular and rather close intervals on a foundation of veiling so sheer that it is scarcely perceptible. The spot is one color; the foundation another. Thus: rust spots on taupe or brown; green or royal blue on black or dark blue; flamingo on brown, and so forth. The same idea is also carried out in larger spots farther apart.

Accessory to the Easter hat, is the hat pin, no longer with a plebeian black or white china ball for a head, but a large mother-of-pearl with antique silver filigree, horn shapes made of genuine horn or more likely composition, and by the way, I saw a hat in a city show room with a pair of these horns in Coral shade placed in the front of a red Mephisto-like turban full of Satanic suggestion. But they may be used otherwise with more pleasing effect. There are jet daggers and many other devices, and it might be observed that hat pins are used for ornamentation rather than utility.

AS Easter is so near at hand, and neckwear is such an important consideration in connection with the Easter costume, perhaps I may throw in a few hints concerning the new things which the shops will be showing in the preceding days. Of course, the fur neckpiece of some kind will be pre-eminent. With Easter coming in March, a fur neckpiece will certainly be necessary with the spring suit, but it is of the lingerie neckwear that I would write. At first, one looked and looked and found nothing new, and then, suddenly like the plant that bursts into bloom over night, I came across a wealth of new neckwear, made of sheer organdie, batiste and lace.

With many of the suit jackets, a vestee will be essential, and one of the newest of these is in the form of a sleeveless blouse, made of ecru organdie with Czecho-Slovak embroidery. Another was a simple front of pleated net which looked like chipped crystal, with a narrow frill of the same at the top. There are sets, collars and vestees of ecru organdie or batiste, beautiful with broderie anglaise and at one place I found some beautiful pure white linen suit collars and sets with the same form of decoration which is perhaps more familiar to us as eyelet embroidery.

openings next month, and I have not said anything about the larger models, a few of which will be shown at the same time, but which we are not expected to take up till a little later. It is one of the traditions that we begin the season with small hats and wear the larger ones when the trees are in leaf. With one exception the illustrations on this page are quite conservative. The Editor doesn't like the way the lace falls over the brim and hides the face, but it wasn't really selected because any one who had anything to say about it, feally liked it in its entirety, but because of the

Attractive Gowns That Enhance the Charm of the Wearer

9167—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 9339—Ladies' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 6½ yards 36-inch dotted foulard—9½ yards grosgrain ribbon—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The uneven hem line which is such a striking feature of the new fashions is achieved in this foulard frock by the side panels on the skirt which are longer than the skirt itself and are looped under. Topping this is one of the smart new tie-back blouses. Grosgrain ribbon finishes the edges of the blouse, the flowing sleeves, and the skirt panel.

9341—Ladies' Overblouse. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. No. 8670—Ladies' Two-piece Draped Skirt. Designed for 24 to 32 waist. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. The costume in medium size requires 4¼ yards 36-inch Canton crêpe—2⅞ yards 36-inch lining for underbody and foundation gores. Beading in design 12601 is used in large circular motifs on the skirt, and in border effect on the blouse. Below the beaded belt which is applied to the sides, the blouse descends in points. The skirt is in harem style gathered to a two-piece foundation skirt.

9302—Ladies' Evening Dress. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. Size 36 requires 6 yards 40-inch charmeuse—1½ yard 11-inch lace for camisole band—¾ yard 36-inch lining. There is nothing more charming for evening wear than this draped model that suggests the princess effect. The front and back are cut in one piece and draped and while one side is brought up in a point to the shoulder, the other side is open disclosing a deep camisole-like band of heavy Venise lace. The back panel may extend to form a train if desired, lined with silver tissue or brocade.

9141—Ladies' Evening Blouse. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. No. 9221—Ladies' Two-piece Draped Skirt. Designed for 24 to 32 waist. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. The costume in medium size requires 4¼ yards 40-inch Georgette—1½ yard 10-inch silver lace for band—2¾ yards 36-inch satin lining. Most unusual in style is the blouse of this evening gown with its three narrow looped-under panels at the back. In front the blouse crosses surplice-wise over a deep band of heavily embroidered silver lace. There is just a suggestion of drapery to the skirt which is made with a tunic in four sections. The front section is slightly draped toward the side panels.

9265—Ladies' Draped Princess Dress. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. Size 36 requires 4⅞ yards 36-inch satin—1¾ yard 36-inch lining. Tho there is a two-piece foundation skirt, the over-dress is really in princess effect dipping to the bottom of the skirt at the center-front and back and draped at the sides. This makes a very attractive dinner gown as the décolletage is very moderate.

9269—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. No. 9227—Ladies' Draped Skirt. Designed for 24 to 32 waist. Width at lower edge about 1¼ yard. The costume in medium size requires 5¼ yards 36-inch taffeta—1½ yard 9-inch lace flouncing to trim underskirt—3½ yards 36-inch lining. The draped tunic is elaborated with beaded motifs in design 12574. These may be carried out in small beads or bugles in self or contrasting color beads. White or gray taffeta beaded in silver, or turquoise blue or shell pink radium silk beaded in gold, would make charming evening gowns. The lace that shows in front below the tunic may be Chantilly, silver or gold, to match the beading.

THE CHARM OF MYSTERY

Lady Duff Gordon, the world-famed Lucile, recently wrote, "Essential to woman's allure and charm is the veil that half hides her from the world, stimulating the imagination to fancy for itself the harmonies that it may hide."

Reflect but a moment upon this truth and its relation to becoming dress—particularly becoming corsetry.

The art authority, Millet, has said that "Technique should hide itself modestly behind the thing to be expressed." The chief danger nowadays lies not so much in our failing to appropriate art's little aids but in being too lavish with them. After all, we live in a very subtle and sophisticated world, and the corset that through one fault or another obtrudes itself upon the observer, defeats its purpose and quite spoils the illusion of desirableness.

The mystery of the modern corset lies in its skillful adaptation to the natural lines of the figure. Its self-effacing artistry enhances a woman's points of beauty, hides her disharmonies, and creates the impression of a gracefully poised body faultlessly proportioned by nature. So Gossard technique hides itself discreetly behind the beauty it expresses.

Individual solution of the problem of corsetry is the only method that promises success. Study yourself and be mindful that violent contrast between waist and hips and bust, not only makes becoming dress impossible, but violates that charm of mystery that proper corsetry enhances.

And this alluring mystery of beauty is for every woman, for Gossard artistry has made a study of every figure need from the little lady of slightest figure to the matron of full proportions. You will be delighted with the self-effacing Gossards that seem to have been created for you alone.

Because of the naturalness of its healthful support, your Gossard is relieved of all undue strain and so will wear far beyond the life of the average corset. Its original grace and shapeliness will remain unchanged to the last day you put it on. In the economy of this superior wearing service alone, these original front lacing corsets are worth their cost.

are to be found at those stores distinguished by a corset department that offers a real service.

Trained corsetieres who will make your satisfaction a matter of personal pride, assure you the models best suited to your needs. When you buy a Gossard, you buy a SERVICE: a style service, a comfort service and a wearing service that must be unquestionably satisfactory to you.

Gossard Corsets are fairly priced within the reach of every woman; and their superior quality which for years has been consistently maintained above imitation, assures the economical buyer a thrifty and lasting pride in ownership.

GOLD SEAL
ART-RUGS

Beautiful, sanitary—and low-priced!

In these days of high prices, it is pleasing to know that one can still get beautiful, sanitary, easy-to-clean rugs for little money.

Gold-Seal Congoleum Art-Rugs meet perfectly the nation-wide necessity for economy in the home. At the same time, they have all the style of expensive woven rugs, but are made of a durable material, with a smooth, waterproof, printed surface that does not collect dirt and moisture to menace your health.

A few moments with a damp mop brings back their charm and beauty. Besides, they have the remarkable feature of requiring no fastening to the floor and will not curl or "kick up" at the edges.

How I Turned Pleasant Hours at Home Into Dollars

A Narrative by EDNA L. RIVERS

LAURA COMSTOCK came over to my house one hot morning last May and threw herself down despondently in the morris chair.

She is my next door neighbor and my closest friend, so it isn't surprising that we share a good many confidences. I saw from her face and red eyes that Laura wanted to get something off her mind, so I said:

"Tell me the worst at once. Has Frank lost his job? Or has your Bobby put a button up his nose? Or have you spilled ink on the one and only Turkish rug? Or is it a real catastrophe?"

Laura smiled a little, in spite of herself, and replied:

"No, I wish it was a real catastrophe; then it would be over sooner—but I just can't stand the continual skimping and scraping of money. It's just economize, economize, economize—and with all that Frank and I can do, we never do more than make ends meet. Frank ought to get a good vacation this Summer and we can't afford it. I need some new Summer clothes, and I've got to make over my last year's organdie and retrim my old hat. And Bobby—well, Bobby goes through a pair of shoes in almost no time, and they cost more now than his father's used to. And, to cap the climax, Frank got a letter this morning saying that our rent is going to be raised ten dollars. Isn't it awful? I think I have a right to cry!"

I agreed with Laura about that, for I was having similar worries myself, but I wanted to cheer her up a little, so I said:

"Well, if our husbands can't make more money for us, let's go into business for ourselves. You and I would make fine partners. All that's lacking is the business. What can we make, or do, that will sell?"

Laura shook her head sadly.

"My dear," she said, "there's nothing I haven't thought of—getting subscriptions for magazines, embroidering, making fine cakes to sell, stenography, and a lot of other things. But the things I think of either cost too much to start, or they would take me away from the children just when they need me most. There are objections to all of them. It's no use."

She reached over to the table, picked up a magazine and began to turn the pages idly, while she tried to keep the tears back. Suddenly she sat up straight and began to read intently. I glanced over her shoulder and saw the words, "Make Money in Your Own Home." We both read the page through without stopping. Then I said:

"Let's send to Toronto and find out all about it. It sounds good. I really believe we've found that business we were trying to think of."

Well, we did send, and when the booklet and circulars arrived we found that we really had found just the kind of business we wanted.

Now, after only a few months, the money situation is entirely changed in both Laura's home and mine. She didn't have to put up with her last year's dress and hat, and neither did I. We stopped worrying about money. In August both our families had a wonderful two weeks' camping trip in the woods, and we did it without

Laura and I having to give up our "business." In fact, we took it with us, and it paid for our fun while we were having it.

And it didn't take any more time than we have often spent on "fancy work," that didn't bring a cent. Besides, the work was so simple that Laura's Bobby and my little girl learned to help in the "business," too.

When my husband and Laura's both began to take a hand at using the machines, we named our camp "The Make Money at Home Club," and the name has stuck. Since we have been back in town, several of our neighbors, women who had also been battling with the high cost of living, have joined our club, and have begun to make money with the Auto Knitter.

That is the name of the wonderful little machine that has enabled all the members of our club to escape from the worry and heartache of making ends meet. How did we do it? Simply by knitting socks. No, not by the slow, old process of hand-knitting, which took about a day for one sock, but by using the Auto Knitter.

This marvelous but very simple, easily-worked machine turns out fine, seamless, wool socks with almost magical speed. Now that Laura and I have gained practice with the Auto Knitter, we often make a sock in only ten minutes.

And the best part of it is that we have a guaranteed, constant market for every pair of socks we make at a guaranteed price. The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company of Toronto has contracted to take every sock our club turns out. Every member has a machine, and as soon as we have a shipment of ten dozen pairs finished we send it right off, and back comes the pay check by return mail, together with a new supply of wool to replace that used in the socks sent to the company. We wait until we have ten dozen pairs because the company pays the shipping charge on ten dozen or over.

The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company is an old, firmly-established Canadian corporation, engaged in the manufacture of high-grade seamless socks. They have always preferred home manufacture to factory production. They believe in the independent employee, and know from experience that the best work is that done by well-paid, contented people, working in happy homes.

The Company's wide business connections give them an enormous market for socks—everybody, everywhere, needs them—and the Company will gladly take all the socks you can supply them with.

When you decide to become an Auto Knitter worker, as Laura and I did, The Auto Knitter Company will make a contract to pay you a fixed, guaranteed wage on a piece-work basis. This contract leaves you perfectly free—you can work for them as much as you want, or as little as you want—spare time or full time. And for every shipment of socks you send them you will get your pay-check—promptly.

You are, of course, at liberty to dispose of the output of your Auto Knitter as you see fit; you can also use the Auto Knitter to make, at a remarkably low cost, all the hosiery your family needs.

But remember this: There are absolutely no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight out-and-out employment offer at a Fixed Wage on a piece-work basis—a good pay for your services alone.

No matter where you live, I feel sure that you want to know all about the machine that has meant so much to Laura and me, and all the others in our "Make Money at Home Club." By all means write to The Auto Knitter Company at once and find out about the pleasant occupation waiting for you—Auto Knitting. Find out what substantial amounts even a small part of your spare time will earn for you.

Remember that experience is unnecessary; that you do not need to know how to knit. The Auto Knitter does the work.

I can never be thankful enough that Laura and I didn't put off writing for information about it on that May morning when we were both so discouraged.

You will never regret writing for it, either. Send your name and address now and find out all the good things that are in store for you. The Auto Knitter Hosiery (Canada) Co., Ltd., Dept. 1353-K, 1870 Davenport Rd., Toronto, Ont.

Charming Uses for New Gingham and Voiles

9318—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $4\frac{1}{2}$  yards 32-inch gingham—1 yard 36-inch voile for collar, cuffs, bands, and pockets—1 yard ribbon for bow. The collar, cuffs, and pocket flaps are made of voile and trimmed with narrow bands of the voile caught down with wide stitches in mercerized floss. The waist is cut with paneled front extended to make the sash, and the front is trimmed with bound buttonholes and crochet buttons on loops.

9327—Ladies' Overblouse. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Size 36 requires 2 yards 40-inch Georgette crepe— $2\frac{1}{4}$  yards grosgrain ribbon—2 yards soutache braid. The overblouse has elbow-length sleeves and a high rolling collar trimmed with braid and faced at the edge in front with ribbon, which also outlines the U-shaped opening. The fulness is drawn to the sides by the ribbon inserted in casings.

9334—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 42 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{3}{4}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $5\frac{1}{2}$  yards 36-inch cotton poplin— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard 36-inch white linen for collar, cuffs, and piping of belt—2 yards rick-rack braid for trimming collar and cuffs— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The waist opens down the center-front. The skirt has a very deep tuck and a deep hem the same width as the tuck. The belt fastens with a buckle covered with linen. Rick-rack braid, which has been revived this season, finishes the collar and cuffs.

9337—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Size 36 requires  $2\frac{3}{4}$  yards 36-inch voile— $3\frac{1}{4}$  yards plaiting to trim. The round collar, deep turn-back cuffs, and box plait in front are trimmed with narrow plaiting. The back of the blouse extends over the shoulders to give a yoke effect in front, and the fronts are gathered below the yoke throwing a slight fulness over the bust. The blouse closes in front through the box plait.

9218—Ladies' Tunic Blouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 8835—Ladies' Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard. The costume in medium size requires 6 yards 36-inch flowered voile— $\frac{3}{8}$  yard 40-inch white organdy for vest and collar, and for piping cuffs and fronts of blouse— $\frac{7}{8}$  yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The collar and vest are trimmed with blanket stitch in colored silk floss.

8818—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{5}{8}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $4\frac{3}{8}$  yards 32-inch check gingham— $\frac{1}{2}$  yard 36-inch voile for collar, cuffs, vest, and pipings— $2\frac{1}{2}$  yards lace for trimming. The paneled front widens at the waist-line and at the underarm seams is joined to the sash. The front gore of the skirt is laid in inverted plaits to give a panel effect, as well as additional fulness.

8941—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about  $1\frac{3}{8}$  yard. Size 36 requires  $5\frac{3}{4}$  yards 32-inch gingham— $\frac{1}{2}$  yard 36-inch white voile for collar and bands on sleeves— $1\frac{1}{8}$  yard lace to trim collar. The skirt is trimmed with two wide bands of gingham cut on the bias. The waist closes under the applied panel in front, and the panel is joined to the girde under the arms. The kimono sleeves are elbow length. The tie-back blouse is increasing in popular favor and it is in vogue for frocks of every type, from the inexpensive tub frock to the fussy afternoon gown.

MY Dear Club Members:
It is splendid to have a real live club such as ours. We are well started on another year, a bit larger, a bit better, and a bit better acquainted. Your letters have been so full of good wishes for the Journal Juniors' Club, and your stories continue to improve in interest and construction.

We have quite a number of new members this month, and from their stories I am sure there is not one who will not prove to be an active, progressive member.

Ours is a club of Canadians, with Canadian ideas and ideals. Loyalty to our country, to each other, and to ourselves, will develop the best in each of us and in our club.

Gladys Cullum has sent "A Farm Breakfast," in a most attractive setting. A story, particularly one in which there is not rapid action, depends largely on care in scene-placing and description.

I am glad, Marjorie Hennessey, that you have decided to join us. There are no rules other than those printed on the club page, but interest in our contests, and competing yourself, en-

"Bert's Pet." A dear little story it is, Kathleen La Pointe, both fresh and bright. I should like to hear from you again soon.

A most welcome letter, and a splendid story, came from Hope Cushing. In "Jim's Holiday" she tells us of the enjoyment the city boy found in the freedom of the country.

A quaint and very pretty story, "Biddy's Breakfast Hour," you sent us, Mary E. Jackson. I always expect something good from you, Mary, and you never disappoint me.

"Jack's Pets," by Hilda Allen, is a story with "lots of fun" in it, interestingly told, and cleverly developed.

"Willie's Visit to the Farm," by Lyl Morris Blake. This is a splendid story, and, though not the prize-winner, is most worthy of mention. Neatness and punctuation show especial care. I like your story, Lyl. Be sure and enter our competition next month.

"The Priceless Treasure," by Evaline R. Gass, is a prize-winner, and I am sure all the club members will enjoy it. Our congratulations, Evaline.

I was so glad to get another story, courages others to take an active part. I liked your story, "A Visit to the Farm," for its freshness and clearness. Write me again, telling me of your progress in music.

"A Visit to the Country"—the story of a good time. This was yours, Iris Kempton, and very close to being a prize-winner. It was a delight to read, and I know I shall not be satisfied until I receive your next essay.

A letter and a very pretty story were sent by Estelle Bonneville. I am glad you like our club, Estelle. I am pleased with the way you show in your story, "Danie's Hens," the value of encouragement.

Evelyn Grant tells us of "Fred's Day in the Country." Imagine the turkey-gobbler after Fred!

"Rusty's Friend," by Ellen Grey, tells a bright story of true kindness.

Leah Nadeau sends us a story, "On the Farm." There is much good description, careful and pleasing. Yes, I am sure, Leah, you have regretted leaving the farm. Life in the country has a charm that one does not find in the city, and that one never forgets. Write me again, won't you?

Arrow Park Women's Institute, which has always been interested in supplying the needs of the neighborhood, has been making an effort to have a ferry service for the accommodation of the residents on both sides of the lake. Although nothing definite can be accomplished this year the members are hopeful that before another year rolls around the ferry service will be an accomplished fact.

Bonington and South Slocan.—This Institute was one of many to put an exhibit in the Nelson Fruit Fair.

Burton City Women's Institute is supporting the Public Health Nurse. They have taken up the question of Night School or continuation classes and altogether this Institute, although not the largest membership, ranks well to the front in active Institute work. The Secretary states in the last monthly report: "I am very pleased to say that almost every resident in Burton and district is going to contribute something towards the upkeep of the public health nurse, Miss Murray, stationed at East Arrow Park.

Cranbrook Women's Institute listened to Mrs. Miles, school trustee, in October. The subject of her paper was "Education of our Children." In December the Institute had the pleasure of listening to Mrs. Grevette of Calgary.

Crawford Bay held regular meeting. The matter receiving attention was that of Night School classes of instruction provided by the Department of Education. It was decided to ask for a course of lectures during the winter months. The secretary reports: "The Institute had a stall at the Nelson Fall Fair, but unfortunately did not secure a prize. The classes in which this Institute received lowest marks were "Dairy Produce" and "Needlework." They received the highest points as home cooks, and intend to do better next year if they compete again."

Creston Women's Institute has rendered signal service in national welfare. Through the indefatigable efforts of its members a health committee was formed and the residents of the district canvassed for financial support, and a Public Health Nurse engaged. The field of service will include the Soldier Settlement at Lister and with the splendid lead which the Institute has given it is expected that the nurse will have a sympathetic and enlightened community to assist in carrying out the Public Health work.

Harrop Institute has been very active in the Child Welfare work in connection with the school children of the district. A demonstration on dress making was given on November 10th, by the President, Mrs. Ogilvie, which was very much appreciated by all present.

Kaslo. This Institute is another of the Kootenay Women's Institutes which is making strong efforts to establish the Public Health Nurse. The report for the November meeting is very interesting: "An Apple Packing School was discussed and several members enlisted to take a course. Correspondence on Night School was read and discussed. A proposed tour of lecturers from the University of British Columbia was discussed and a committee of two appointed to meet the principals of the Kaslo Public and High Schools to select subjects of general public interest and invite said lecturers to visit Kaslo."

Kootenay Valley Women's Institute has discussed such important matters as "Laws affecting women and children in British Columbia," "Public Health Nursing," and "Care of School Children."

Nelson and District Women's Institute has been giving special attention to the weaving industry.

British Columbia Women's Institutes

By ELIZABETH BAILEY PRICE

The secretary reports: "Two rugs were on display at the meeting on Friday, woven on a hand loom the property of one of the members. The work had been done by Mrs. Garland Foster. Quite a spirit of enthusiasm prevailed during the discussion." Mrs. Garland Foster, member of this Institute, Alderwoman for the city, has been most enthusiastic and tireless in her efforts to have hand weaving taken up and carried on by the women whose time would allow. Mrs. Foster leads the way in its generous response to all calls for help. Since it is "more blessed to give than to receive," this Institute must be the most blessed in the Province.

Willow Point was one of the fortunate Institutes exhibiting at the Nelson Fruit Fair. The exhibits staged under the name of the Institutes were awarded third prize. The secretary reports for December 9th: "A canvass of the district by the members netted the sum of $86.81, and a dance $7.25, all of which was devoted to the War Relief Fund. An instructor has been found for the drill classes for children. Arrangements were made to hold the annual children's Christmas Party on December 28th, and to have it Fancy Dress. The members are still making an attempt to hold dressmaking classes, but one of the difficulties is the finding of a competent teacher."

VANCOUVER ISLAND INSTITUTE CONFERENCE.

THE annual conference of the Vancouver Island Women's Institutes was held in the Provincial Parliament Buildings, Victoria, under the chairmanship of the Advisory Board of Women's Institutes, Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E., whose broadness of views and soundness of judgment, and whose well accomplished work on the Institutes, both here and in England, make her an unquestioned leader in the movement. It was a meeting which combined both work and enjoyment. Starting with community singing of old familiar songs and solo singing, the delegates and visitors were welcomed by his worship the Mayor of Victoria, and afterwards listened to an address from the Premier, the Hon. John Oliver—a speech to country women dealing with their life, their work, their disadvantages and advantages, their need for encouragement and assistance in carrying on what is, after all, one of the finest and most vital occupations of this our daily life, and one in which the woman is, perhaps, more than in any other profession, her husband's partner and adviser. It was the speech of a country man to country women. Then Mr. John Kyle, Director of Technical Education, spoke on the matter of night classes, the organization of which, though nominally in the hands of the school trustees, lies virtually in the power of the Institutes through their knowledge of the women and the needs of the neighborhood. The support given by the Government to these movements, especially in the rural districts where four-fifths of the expenses are paid by grant from the Department of Education, ought to encourage all districts to endeavor to put some movement for night classes on foot. Following on Mr. Kyle, Mrs. Watt spoke briefly on the organization and aims and objects of the Federated Women's Institutes.

The stall at the end of the meeting room and the wall above it were covered with an exhibition of the English and Welsh Women's Institute work. There were shown toys, gloves, socks, beautifully made strong baskets, useful articles made from waste products, many examples of skilful needlework and embroidery, photos and Institute yearly programmes. These last were specially worthy of attention. They showed plainly what a strong hold the Institute work has taken among the country women in England, where the ideals are worked out with true earnestness of attention and thoroughness of detail.

At the end of the room was the stall arranged by the Institutes of the Island. There one could buy many varieties of women's work, from beautifully hand-painted cards and bags and garments of beautiful embroidery and needlework, down to such homely things as jars of marmalade, pickles, fruits, flowers and plum puddings. It was the first attempt on the part of the Island Institutes to offer their work to the public, and certainly gave a splendid talk at the conference in Creston, showing samples of the handwork done by the hand loom of Sussex.

Nakusp Women's Institute has held regular meetings. At the last meeting on November 2nd, a very interesting paper, "Recent Legislation Affecting Women," by Mrs. E. H. S. McLean, was very much appreciated by those present. The desirability of taking on Child Welfare Work was discussed and it was decided to form a local society to work in co-operation with the Women's Institute.

New Denver and District held regular meetings and discussed such subjects as: "How to Beautify New Denver," "Incorporation of New Denver as a Village," "The Laws of British Columbia Governing Women and Children," and the insufficient supply of electricity owing to the high cost, and other topics of general interest. This Institute is anxious to start a library and is in communication with Mr. H. Killam of the Travelling Library.

Robson Women's Institute held usual meetings. At the November meeting Mrs. Rutherford gave an interesting demonstration on basket making, which was thoroughly enjoyed by the large number of members and visitors. Basket making could easily rank among the important home industries in British Columbia. It is hoped that some Institutes may give attention to this and that it may have the place it deserves.

Rock Creek Women's Institute.—This Institute has again responded to appeals for assistance, this time from the Navy League, which received the total of $50.75, $50.00 to the British Relief Fund, $6.25 to the disabled soldiers, $83.42 toward the Rock Creek Cemetery. This Institute

Plank Cookery

By MARY M. NEIL

WHEN the housewife wishes to serve something novel at a company luncheon or breakfast, she orders or prepares that something planked. It may be steak or fish, chickens or chops, or perhaps eggs will be used. The latter lend themselves to this method of cooking most graciously, and they make a tempting appearance.

Planking means to bake or cook food on a plank in the oven, or in a gas stove, or in front of the fire. Planks are made for the purpose about two inches thick and of various sizes, and may be oak, ash, cedar, hickory, or cherry wood. Oak planks are usually selected. The stores are showing planks fitted into silver stands, which adds to their attractiveness, but the plank can be sent to the table on a platter. All planks are grooved, the grooves leading to a hollow groove, for holding the juices or gravy from the meat or fish. The plank, before using, must be heated slowly until quite hot or its flavor will enter the food and ruin it. Rub it well with butter, drippings or salad oil and it is ready for use. Never wash the plank with soap and water, sandpaper it, then rub it clean with brown paper and salt, and put it away in a clean linen bag until required again. The more the plank is used the better the flavor. Never use a steak plank for fish, or vice versa. Some planks have wire loops fastened on them by means of which the food is secured to the board, when this is not the case tacks may be used.

The lower oven of a gas range affords an admirable place for cooking planked food. Nearly all kinds of food are improved in the process of planking. Chicken is most delicious planked. As far as fish is concerned, no other method of cooking can equal it. Be sure that the plank will go into the oven.

Planked Apples with Sausages.—Select good tart apples, core and cut them in halves. Arrange the apples on a hot and buttered plank and place one sausage in each half of apple, prick the sausages in several places to prevent them breaking open from the heat. Place the plank in a hot oven or under the broiler and cook until the sausages are crisp and the apples tender but not broken. Garnish with hot boiled rice and serve at once.

Planked Eggs.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a frying pan, break in eight eggs and cook until the eggs are nearly set, season lightly with salt, pepper and paprika. Cut them out with a plain round cutter and place each on a crouton of fried or toasted bread. Put them on to a hot greased plank, and ornament the eggs with alternate groups of chopped cooked ham or tongue, chopped parsley, and chopped chicken. Put them in a hot oven or under the broiler for a few minutes and serve.

Planked Lobster.—To plank a lobster heat the plank very hot. Split a two pound live lobster and put it in a dripping pan, brush the shell with melted butter or melted drippings, and bake in a hot oven for twenty minutes. Remove the lobster to the greased plank, and garnish with fried potato slices, slices of peeled and chilled tomatoes and sprigs of parsley. Heat in the oven or under broiler for ten minutes, baste with melted butter, dust with salt and pepper, and cook for five minutes longer. Serve hot with melted butter poured over, seasoned with a little lemon juice.

To split a live lobster, cross claws above the head and hold firmly with the left hand. With a sharp pointed knife, held in the right hand, begin at the mouth and make a deep incision, and with a sharp cut draw the knife quickly through the under side of the body (not on the back) and the entire length of the tail. Open the lobster, remove intestinal vein, liver and stomach, and crack the claw shells with a mallet.

Planked Halibut or Salmon.—Have the halibut or salmon cut in slices two inches thick. Two slices can be placed on a medium sized plank. Grease the plank thoroughly, place the fish upon it, and broil under a gas broiler, turning the flame down after the first few moments. Or it can be baked in the oven of a range. Serve on the plank, surrounded by potato balls cut with a vegetable cutter. Heat one-fourth cupful of milk, add one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper, and two tablespoonfuls of chopped parsley. Shake the potato balls in this until well coated, cook in the oven until ready. Serve white sauce separately.

Planked Tongue.—Heat unopened, one can of lunch tongue in boiling water for twenty minutes, turn out and cut in slices one and one-half inches thick. Place these on a hot well-greased plank, garnish with hot mashed potatoes forced through a bag and star tube; reheat in the oven, garnish with parsley and serve hot.

Planked Chicken.—Split one young chicken down the back as for broiling and place it in a roasting tin, skin side down, sprinkle over with salt, pepper and paprika and dot with small pieces of butter, and cook in a hot oven for twenty-five minutes. Then grease a hot plank, and place the chicken on it, skin side up, arrange a border of potatoes around it. Beat together one and one-half tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one teaspoonful of lemon juice, salt and pepper to taste, brush the chicken with this and return to the oven. Bake until the potatoes are brown, serve on the plank and garnish with chopped parsley and cubes of apple or cranberry jelly.

Planked Chops.—Trim and broil on one side only, thick, rather lean chops, then place on a hot greased plank. Meantime, boil twelve sweet potatoes until tender in boiling salted water, drain, peel and mash them, add one tablespoonful of melted butter, one teaspoonful of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper. Beat well and stir in the yolks of two eggs mixed with enough hot milk to form the potatoes into a stiff batter. Then fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs. Force the potatoes through a bag and tube around the chops, and place quarters of cored and pared apples at intervals around the potatoes. Sprinkle the apple with brown sugar and the chops with salt, pepper and paprika and cook in a hot oven until the chops are tender. Serve with onion or tomato sauce.

Planked Steak.—Planking a steak is not a difficult matter, nor does it add to the labor of the cook. To plank a steak, select a tenderloin, porterhouse, or rump steak and get it cut from one and one-half to three-fourths inches thick. Trim it nicely and wipe it with a damp cloth, then remove all superfluous fat. Rub the bottom of a hot frying pan with fat and parbroil the steak for eight minutes, turn it cooked side down on to a hot greased plank. Have ready some potatoes, prepared by adding one tablespoonful of butter, the slightly beaten yolk of one egg, and one-fourth teaspoonful of salt to each cupful of hot riced potatoes, beating until smooth. With a pastry bag and star tube, make a border of the potatoes wide enough to reach from the steak to the edges of the border. Bake until the potatoes are browned and the steak tender. Then dot with butter, season with salt, pepper and paprika, and sprinkle with chopped parsley.

Another Method:—Make a sauce of six tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one teaspoonful of chopped onion, two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice and a few grains of red pepper. Wash the butter, cream it and add the other ingredients. Spread one-third of this mixture upon the centre of the plank. With a pastry bag and tube make a border of potato along the edges of the plank. If desired, hot mashed potatoes thinned with hot milk may be used, and when in place on the plank, brush over with beaten egg. The pan broiled steak is then laid in the centre and covered with the remaining sauce. Buttered beets and boiled carrots are good garnishes to add as it goes smoking hot from the oven to the table.

Through the Looking Glass

by VAIN JANE

CONTINUING the "little sermon in cold-cream," which we began last month, it might be well to next speak of massage and its importance in retaining the proper contour of the face and preventing the skin from becoming wrinkled and shrivelled. It works this result by increasing the circulation and cleansing the pores of the harmful secretions which are the foundations of pimples and blackheads. It is most important, however, that we know something of the science of massage (for a science it has become), before we experiment on the delicate muscles of the face, which, incorrectly worked upon become relaxed and lengthened with dire results.

A few instructions might be given which would be helpful to the novice in this branch of beauty culture. First prepare two towels by soaking them in water, hot enough to be held without discomfort in the hands. Wring one out fairly dry and wrap it on the face, looping it about the chin and bringing the ends up on the forehead. Allow this to remain on a moment, and repeat with the other towel, using them alternately until the skin is quite soft and the face somewhat glowing. Then dry the skin with a soft towel and apply the cream with which you intend to massage the face. When this has been equally distributed, place the finger-tips on the cheeks slightly above the chin and stroke firmly upward and outward until the fingers reach the forehead. Repeat this movement fifteen or twenty times. Then begin another series of strokes in the same direction, but now oblige the fingers to move in a circular direction, making a number of perfectly round "O's" before reaching the terminal point.

The chin should be massaged by taking the point of the chin between fingers and thumb and pressing firmly back along the chin bone until the ear is reached. The forehead should be treated by placing the tips of the fingers so that they meet at the centre and moving them outward and upward until they have reached the temples. Each of these strokes should be repeated twenty or more times, and in the latter case, the straight stroke should be followed by the circular. Maintain a firm pressure, but never bruise the skin and remember that too strenuous massage has the effect of displacing the fat which covers the muscles instead of stimulating it, and thus by too great effort one defeats her own purpose.

Following the massage the face should be again cleaned with hot towels, these being finally wrung out in cold water to close the pores, and after the skin is gently dried a foundation cream may be applied and the customary procedure of dusting with powder proceeded with.

So many little cries from far and near have reached me lately, bewailing the possession of a red nose, and urgently demanding a remedy that I have come to believe that a large percentage of the women of Canada are thus afflicted. This unfortunate condition may only be the result of impaired circulation and increased by severe weather, and in this case, it only requires the application of a special cream with heavy powdering, to camouflage its appearance. If, however, as it may be in some cases, an inherited trouble, or if it comes from any internal disorder, it must be given more especial treatment.

A very excellent lotion for a red nose, and one which should be applied with a pad of absorbent cotton each night before retiring, is composed of:

Powdered Calamine ..... 1 dr.
Zinc Oxide ..... 30 gr.
Glycerine ..... 1/2 dr.
Cherry Laurel Water ..... 4 oz.

Exercise, proper diet and special care of the digestion will go a long way toward rectifying this most annoying condition.

CORRESPONDENCE.

E. S. A.—You have brought up a problem that must certainly agitate the minds of many women situated just as you are—too far from a city to make a personal selection of the garment in question, and at a loss to know what to order by mail. It is a little difficult, however, for me to help you when you put a restriction on the model and the price. I think you are wrong about the front-lace. The pair that "nearly drove you frantic" must have been wrong in every way, but when you secure a model of this kind that is fitted to your figure, there is nothing more comfortable or more likely to improve your lines. However, you seem to have very definite views on the subject, though I have known others with just the same prejudices to come to wearing them. By the way, why should you imagine that I would advise dyeing your hair? If you keep in touch with this department you must know that we do not advocate dyes—we believe firmly in the restoration, as far as possible, of the color through proper care and persistent treatment.

E. M. S.—Dear lady from the East, you are just one of dozens who have the same affliction, and isn't it dreadful how unbecoming the cold weather can make the best of noses if it happens to be sensitive to temperature? There is an excellent cream which I have recommended to a number of our readers and also a recipe for a home-made preparation which I shall send you, but I would advise the former. It will prove less expensive and quite as effective without any of the trouble of making and a small jar will last quite a long time.

VERA.—I had every intention of giving your letter an earlier answer, but there were so many in ahead of you, Miss Vera, that your turn has just now arrived. It really is too bad that a youngster like you should have the joy taken out of life by the ever-present consciousness of an unattractive skin, and I certainly shall do what I can to help you make it better. I am going to ask you first to read the article in our February issue, and to impress on your mind some of the general rules laid down there as a basis on which to build up a healthy skin. Then I shall send you some personal advice, particularly suited to your case. Don't be disheartened—even with a handicap it is quite possible to make wonderful improvement.

JANE.—You are quite modest in the number of your questions, Mademoiselle Jane, and they are very soon answered. I dare say your circulation has been slightly impaired as the result of the operation and this is responsible for the color of your nose, but when your health is quite restored this will no doubt right itself. In the meantime, however, you may as well keep it white and unshining by artificial means. I shall be glad to send you advice about the removal of tan and sunburn, and also tell you what cleaning cream is best for such a skin as you describe. This will be included in my private reply which will go forward soon now.

THROUGH-THE-LOOKING-GLASS COUPON

Should a reader desire to avail herself of any advice which might be given through this department, her inquiry, written on one side of the paper, should be accompanied by this coupon. In the case of desiring a private answer, a stamped and addressed envelope should be enclosed.

In ten minutes— a perfect manicure

Three simple operations will give your nails the grooming that present-day standards require

ONCE, manicuring was slow, difficult and even dangerous. There was no way of removing the ugly, dead cuticle that will collect around the base of the nail—except by cutting. Most people felt that this could be done properly only by a professional manicurist. Even if they did do it themselves, it was an interminable business.

NOW, manicuring is so quick and easy that anybody can have smooth, lovely nails. Cutex has provided a means of removing the dead cuticle simply and safely, without cutting. Just a few minutes' care once or twice a week will keep them looking always as if freshly done.

*This is the way
you do it*

First, the Cuticle Remover. After the filing, shaping and smoothing of the nail tips, dip the end of an orange stick wrapped in cotton into the bottle of Cutex and work carefully around the nail base, gently pushing back the cuticle. Wash the hands; then, when drying them, push the cuticle downwards. The ugly dead cuticle will simply wipe off, leaving a smooth, shapely rim.

Then the Nail White. This is to remove the stains that will persist, and to give the nail tips that immaculate whiteness without which one's nails never seem freshly manicured. Squeeze the paste under the nails directly from the tube, which is made with a pointed tip.

Finally the Polish. Cutex has a polish to suit every taste and to meet every need. For a brilliant, lasting and water-proof polish, use first the paste or stick, then the powder or cake. If you want an instantaneous polish, and without burnishing, one that is also water-proof and lasting, apply a little of the Liquid Polish with the camel's-hair brush that comes with it.

First, a smooth, shapely cuticle; then snowy white tips; then just the brilliant polish you have always wanted.

Cutex Manicure Sets come in three sizes. The "Compact," with trial size packages, 60c; the "Traveling," with full-sized packages, $1.50; the "Boudoir," the finest and most complete set, $3.00. Or each of the Cutex items can be bought for 35 cents.

with all its good wishes. You will write me again, won't you—letters and stories, too?

There is a snapshot here from Gladys Cullum. I like pretty pictures, Gladys, and I'm sure you have one for our next contest.

Iris Kempton's snapshot is the prize-winner, and we congratulate her, and thank her, too, for showing the club a scene so truly Canadian.

Your active interest will, I know, make this a "worth while" month for our club. So I am looking for your stories, and the letters that are just like "little talks" with each of you.

Your sincere friend,
BERTHA E. GREEN.

Rules for Membership.

1. Any boy or girl from 8 years to 16 years who will take an interest in the club and will compete at least once in contest will be warmly welcomed as a member.

2. No fee is required.

3. Each one when contributing either by letter or essay will kindly state whether he or she is a new or old member.

List of New Members.

The members of the Journal Juniors' Club and myself welcome as members the following:

PRIZE STORY.

The Priceless Treasure.

ON a large farm in sunny Alberta lives little Ralph Martin, with his father and mother.

Ralph's father keeps a large flock of hens, and ever since the little boy was a baby he loved to feed and watch them. His father, noticing how interested he was in poultry, told him last spring that he might have two hens and two "settings" of eggs for his very own, and that he might set the hens and look after the chickens himself.

Ralph, then ten years old, clapped his hands in glee, and immediately set to work to get a place ready for the hens.

The hens were set early in May. One hen, however, persisted in leaving the nest for hours at a time, and as a result, only one chicken hatched out—a gray Plymouth Rock.

But the other hen brought out 11 chicks—five white, three black and two gray. How soft and dear they looked, all cuddled together! Ralph thought he had never seen such pretty ones.

Canadian Women's Institutes

showed that the country woman could show many varied and useful occupations to which she could turn her hand.

The sessions on the two following days, Thursday and Friday, were full of work and enthusiasm. Almost all Institutes had two or more delegates, and other interested members were present. The roll call, "What My Institute Has Meant to Me," and the yearly reports were all encouraging, only one or two exceptions being noticed. One felt that the methods, more than the principle, were at fault in these cases. The morning ended with a practical demonstration on spinning and weaving, after which, by the kindness of the ladies of the Canadian Club, the whole party was entertained at lunch in the Parliament Buildings. The afternoon session gave still more reports, an instructive paper on co-operation by Mrs. Watson of Gordon Head, and a talk on "National and Provincial Organization" by Mrs. Watt, a subject all the more interesting because the need was felt for some fresh organization on the part of the British Columbia Institutes to fall in line with the more advanced provinces. But the evening was given over to enjoyment. First a lantern lecture by Mrs. Tyrrell-Godman on "Sussex Homes and Farms." To those long away from England it seemed almost like gazing on something new to see the thatched roofs, the tall quaint chimneys and gables of the English houses, the Sussex downs and the English oaks. Especially interesting too, were the various pictures showing the land girls and classes of Institute members busy making cheeses, boot making, etc. The evening ended with a short, amusing play by the girls of Gordon Head.

The chief features of the Friday session were the roll call, "How to interest members in their Institute," and hints on the making of programmes. Both subjects brought forth many valuable suggestions, discussion and consideration on Resolutions from the Advisory Board took up part of the time which finished with a glove and lace making demonstration. The hostesses for the delegates that day were the Local Council of Women, who kindly provided lunch.

The afternoon session was one of the greatest interest to all present, because of the unanimous feeling that the existing regulations of the Institutes needed revision. Dissatisfaction was felt by all present. Like all growing organizations the women felt that they had advanced beyond their present forms and rules; they needed some further outlet and wider scope for their work. The result of the afternoon's conference was a resolution asking for a central or provincial organization, working with the government and conferring together on all matters pertaining to the Institutes and their work. An address by the Superintendent of Institutes, Dr. Warnock, concluded the afternoon, during which he complimented the Institutes on their improvement in business matters pertaining to their work. A vote of thanks and confidence was passed to Dr. Warnock at the conclusion of his address.

In the evening the speeches were particularly interesting. The chair was taken by Dr. Warnock, and the programme began with an address, both amusing and instructive by Mrs. Harris of Victoria, on the "Matter of buying fleece and method of obtaining and cleaning the wool necessary for spinning and making comforters." After this useful demonstration an interesting report was read by Mrs. Fadden, representative of the Lower Mainland Institutes, telling of the work accomplished over there. This was followed by an address on education by Mr. Charlesworth, secretary of the Federated Teachers' Association. His remarks on Rural Schools, their advantages and disadvantages, their teachers and trustees, the children of the rural community and their difference from those of town, his clear and lucid statements and well balanced judgment made his address one of the most striking features of the whole

The little chick in the other flock seemed to be an outcast: both of the hens were cross to it, so Ralph took it into the house and put it in a box lined with soft hay. Chickie was quite contented here, and grew so tame that she would perch on Ralph's shoulder and eat out of his hand.

By the time the warm weather came the chickens had grown to be ugly, long-legged pullets and cockerels covered with "pin-feathers," which would eventually develop into glossy feathers.

The little boy let his flock out in the sunshine on bright days, but "Speckles," as he called his pet, never went with the other chickens, but stayed by himself, or followed Ralph like a faithful little dog.

Thanksgiving came. The Martins usually had turkey for Thanksgiving dinner, but this year they had no turkeys of their own, so they decided to have a chicken instead. Mr. Martin promised to buy one of his son's chickens, so one day he went to the hen-house and found Ralph in front of it feeding his flock.

"Well, son," he said, "I have come to buy one of your chickens."

Ralph assumed a very grown-up air. "Very well, sir," he replied, "You may take your pick."

With a sly grin his father bent down and picked up "Speckles." "I think I'll take this one," he observed.

Ralph turned, "Oh, father, you just can't have Speckles," he cried, "I wouldn't sell Speckles for all the money in the world."

Mr. Martin chuckled. "All right, sonny, you may keep your Speckles," he returned, and, after selecting a fine plump cockerel, he walked away.

When he had gone, Ralph bent down and took his pet in his arms.

"Well, Speckles, did you think I would let you be a Thanksgiving dinner?" he asked her.

"Cluck, cluck, cluck," declared Speckles, which meant, no doubt, "Why, of course I didn't."

A Little Brown Bulb—A Golden Cup

A GROUP of children are standing at a big, sunny window looking at a beautiful golden daffodil. Would you like to know where it came from? Listen carefully to what the lovely flower says:

"I don't know where my original home was, but my first recollections were of a sweet-faced, white-haired lady who lived in old Ontario. One day she said, 'I'm going to send the bulb to Jean, out in Central British Columbia.'"

"My, what fun they had planting me! Then they put me in a dark cellar and watched every day to see a sprout."

"At last a green shoot appeared and in a few days I was brought up and placed in a dim, warm corner. Later they put me in the sunny window where the children spent much time watching my rapid growth. Dark-haired Edna, grey-eyed Catherine, sturdy Jean; even brother Tom, would pause a minute to see if the colour was showing yet. And the little ones! Sarah Sunshine would stand and smile the way that had won her the name, till I think it helped me grow. Even Baby Millie, with two fingers in her mouth, watched and never pinched my tender leaves even once."

"Would I be open in time for Easter?—was the question. Sometimes they thought I would, and sometimes they thought I wouldn't."

Then on Easter morning they all came to the sunny window and looked at the beautiful golden daffodil which last Autumn was a little dry, brown, onion-like bulb. And again they saw the old truth illustrated. "If it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." So as Christ was the first-fruit, we keep Easter every year in His memory.

The Wind Wheel of the Djinn

The Breath of the Cherry Springtime

By BERTHA E. GREEN

HIGH on his mountain-top sat the master of the winds, Aewol, the Djinn. Slowly, silently, endlessly he turned the great wheel, and as he turned, he watched. His clear, far-seeing gaze searched the sky and the ever-billowing sea of clouds that rolled below him.

Far to the Westward appeared a faint pink haze, like the first flush of dawn: it grew no brighter, but, as time passed, the haze came nearer to the Djinn, softly but surely.

It was another wind come home, one of those world-travellers who follow the same course o'er land and sea from year to year. And this was one of them, who had returned to Aewol, for it was a long-travelling Trade Wind that had come home again, bringing its pictured story of a cherry springtime.

Oyama San dwelt in a little house near the main road that led through until they reached the gardens, the beautiful gardens that are open to everyone all day long.

There were fish to be watched in the clear streams, and flowers, and crooked, stunted trees, so small they grew in flower-pots.

The children did not linger for long, for everything in the garden was familiar to them. There was another reason, too, that kept them from tarrying.

Their way led them across a little, wooden bridge, that spanned the largest stream in the garden, and, turning, they had reached the spot that always drew them in their play-time hours.

Right at the stream's edge, almost in it, grew a tree, an old, old tree, whose trunk came springing up in three or four, or five shaggy, brown arms, to branch out high and wide. It would have been a beautiful spot to

The little men were quarrelling.

Kanazawa. This little house was home to Oya and Toto as well, but not so much a home, just now, as was outdoors, for it was the Springtime of Japan.

Now, Kanazawa is not far from the sea, and there was a freshness to the wind that blew from it, the clearest of blue skies, and the sweetest of flowers. So is it any wonder that this morning saw Oya and Toto outside the quaint little house in the warm sunlight? At their feet were fluffy, little chickens, and loud-quacking ducks, all busy breakfasting.

The children's mother, quiet Oyama San, had given them the morning task of feeding all these feathered ones, for there must be eggs to sell, and little chicks, too, so that there might be other things for those who lived in the little house.

Oya was a year older than her brother, Toto, and always took the lead in everything. So it was now, that, holding a brass dish at arm's length, she turned it upside down, and said:

"The feeding-time is over, Toto. Our work is done, and there is the whole day to play, to be with the flowers, and—"

"And to visit our cherry-tree," said Toto, promptly.

THE two quaint, little figures entered the house again, and asked "the honorable little mother" if they might play, now that their work was done. Then out into the sunshine again, on to the street, and along it, play, if there had been only the shade of cool, green leaves upon the branches. But there was more, for every little twig was laden with pink blossoms, and the soft wind of the morning carried the sweetness of the cherry-bloom.

There were birds in the branches, and they were sweet to listen to. The cherry petals drifted down, and the ones that fell in the stream were make-believe, pink ducklings, while those that found a resting-place upon the stones were rosy chicks, to the children.

Then there were games to play, and laughing—racing through the garden.

But Oya and Toto always came back to their cherry-tree by the stream, and, tired just a bit, rested on the flat step-like stones beneath the blossoming branches.

To you and me it would have been a dreamy Fairyland, and it must have been nearly that to Oya and her brother, too. The light wind whispered softly; there was a soothing hum of honey-hunting bees, and, before they knew, the little ones were sleeping, dreaming, into their Fairyland, where we will follow, too.

There was a little stream winding its unhurried way through Fairyland. Its banks were rocky and only here and there did the grass grow to the water's edge. There were few trees near the brook to make cool shadows for the little fish to rest in, and the sunlight, warm as midsummer, shone from a cloudless sky.

New Method Makes Music Amazingly Easy to Learn

Learn to Play or Sing. Every Step Made Simple as A.B.C.

TRY IT ON APPROVAL

Entire Cost Only a Few Cents a Lesson—and Nothing Unless Satisfied

How often have you wished that you knew how to play the violin or piano—or whatever your favorite instrument may be—or that you could take part in singing?

How many an evening's pleasure has been utterly spoiled and ruined by the admission "I can't sing," or "No, I am sorry, but I can't play."

And now—at last—this pleasure and satisfaction that you have so often wished for can easily be added to your daily life.

No need to join a class. No need to pay a dollar or more per lesson to a private teacher. Neither the question of time nor expense is any longer a bar—every one of the obstacles that have been confining your enjoyment to simply mere listening have now been removed.

My method of teaching music—in your spare time at home with no strangers around to embarrass you—makes it amazingly easy to learn to sing by note or to play any instrument.

You don't need to know the first thing about music to begin—don't need to know one note from another. My method takes out all the hard parts—overcomes all the difficulties—makes your progress easy, rapid and sure.

Whether for an advanced pupil or a beginner, my method is a revolutionary improvement over the old methods used by private teachers. The lessons I send you explain every point and show every step in simple Print-and-Picture form that you can't go wrong on—every step is made as clear as A.B.C.

My method is as thorough as it is easy. I teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note.

No "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind.

I call my method "new"—simply because it is so radically different from the old and hard-to-understand ways of teaching music. But my method is thoroughly time tried and proven. Over 250,000 successful pupils—from boys and girls of 7 to 8 to men and women of 70—are the proof. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, I have built up the largest school of music in the world.

To prove what I say, you can take any course on trial—singing or any instrument you prefer—and judge entirely by your own progress. If for any reason you are not satisfied with the course, or with what you learn from it, then it won't cost you a single penny. On the other hand, if you are pleased with the course, the total cost amounts to only a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything also included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy why continue to confine your enjoyment of music to mere listening? Why not at least let me send you my free book that tells you all about my methods? I know you will find this book absorbingly interesting, simply because it shows you how easy it is to turn your wish to play or sing into an actual fact. Just now I am making a special short-time offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before the special offer is withdrawn. No obligation—simply use the coupon and send your name and address in a letter session. After a hearty vote of thanks and several questions asked, he was followed by Dr. Young, Provincial Officer of Health, speaking on the most important matter of public health. This is a question which is coming more and more to the notice of the public. The feeling of the communities and the laws of the Province for the health of its children should stand on the same level as its educational laws. Were women's Institutes to devote all their time to the enlightenment and education of the people of the country to the vital matter of perfect health as the birthright of every child, they would be doing one of the most lasting and efficient tasks that they could undertake. Much ignorance and prejudice and narrow vision needs cleansing away before this ideal state of affairs can come into existence. During the session of the conference a member of the Institute was appointed on the recently organized board of the Provincial Association Victorian Order of Nurses.

Canadian Women's Institutes

The conference was to have closed on Friday evening, but the suggested organization of a Provincial Association of the Women's Institutes necessitated the holding of a further session on Saturday morning. Nearly all the delegates remained. There was practically the same attendance, and the same interest shown throughout the morning in what proved to be one of the busiest sessions of the whole conference. Plans and nominations for committees to be formed on Child Welfare Education, Home Economics, Agriculture for Women, Legislation, etc., were discussed. A town centre for Institutes was arranged, and a committee formed under the able leadership of Mrs. Tyrrell-Godman. Then votes of thanks, talks of trains and stages, and hearty good-byes were exchanged. The conference members passed out of the Parliament Buildings in little groups of friends journeying together. To all outward appearances the conference was over, to those who understand it was but the beginning of new thoughts, new plans, new organizations, which carried out with faithfulness and efficiency will bear much fruit in after years.

GLEANINGS FROM SASKATCHEWAN.

MISS ABBIE DELURY, superintendent for Saskatchewan, has sent the following reports:

Good Cheer Home Makers' Club, Wilcox, reports that during the winter months they have all-day meetings, a feature since the organization.

A menu committee assigns each member her portion so there is no confusion or overlapping in culinary art. The hostess stretches her table to full capacity and it is loaded. Such good dinners and good fellowship, two feasts in one! The husbands are included, and by the way, the men furnish the programme, they enjoy it too. At the December meeting the sum of fifty dollars was voted to the child feeding fund, and the same sum to the librarian to take care of the Home Makers' library in Wilcox. Miss May gave a dressmaking demonstration for five days which was very fine, and all the classes were well attended.

In reporting the prices to Miss Delury, from Paynton, Sask., butter in December, is quoted at fifty cents per pound, eggs 55c and 60c, chicken 25c per pound, fowl 18c to 20c and beef 14c to 16c. The Home Makers' Club of this community is all ready to begin work on their new rest room in the spring. The plans were presented by The T. Eaton Co. The secretary reports that the public health nurse is very proficient and a great boon to the district.

Pense Home Makers' Club has been very active, one of the big undertakings being the decision to adopt a foreign school. The membership of this branch is sixty, but the average attendance is forty. During the summer months every month a crate of eggs is sent to the Children's Home in Regina, while during the summer the little tots were visited, and three quilts presented. Just now there is discussion about the forming of a junior branch.

Are You Proud of Your Car?

THE measure of pride you take in your car is determined very largely by its outward appearance.

It may be a perfect marvel as far as performance is concerned and yet look like a dilapidated taxi.

Perhaps you realize that the car does need a new dress and you hesitate only because of the expense involved.

Why not paint it yourself? A Dougall Da-cote finish applied by yourself some afternoon will give you excellent results and, while not equal to professional work, will be a whole lot better than the old dingy, shabby coat.

Da-cote is made in black and white and eight popular colors. It flows on smoothly and dries overnight. If your local dealer does not stock Da-cote write us for color-card and we will send you the name of a merchant who can supply you.

The Journal Puzzle for March

By TOM WOOD

Circle No. 1 represents a large river in the Canadian North-West. All the outstanding figures in this circle may be spelled by letters from the whole name, as indicated by numbers at the side.

Circle No. 2 stands for a well-known lake in New Ontario. Numbers to the left spell the five things represented therein.

Circle No. 3 stands for a lake in Manitoba. What things in the circle can you spell from its name?

The four things in circle No. 4 may be spelled from the name of one of the months. Which is it and what are they?

Two prizes will be given—first, two dollars, and second, one dollar—for the best solution, judged according to neatness and accuracy. All are eligible to compete. Answers must be received by March 20th to be included.

Solutions to January Puzzle

The Wind Wheel of the Djinn

IT was such a little stream that one might see the smallest things near it, and, because there was only one it was easy to see the cherry-stone. It was lying in the sunlight, on a bare, flat rock by the stream's edge, and on each side of it sat a little man in a loose dress of red-brown. Each of them carried a sharp, shining knife, and each wore long, ever-so-long, black moustaches.

The little men were quarreling. You could not have heard a word, but somehow you would have known that one of them was saying:

"The cherry-pit is mine; and after I have opened it, and eaten the kernel, I will make one half of the shell into a rice-bowl, and keep the other half for a hat."

And you would just have known the other little man was answering:

"The cherry-pit is mine; and I will take my knife, and carve the stone into a basket with a handle."

Then each of the two little men took hold of the cherry-stone, and as they pulled and tugged, the cherry-stone rolled and bumped from one flat stone to another, until the next roll meant a drop into the brook.

While the little men were still struggling, there was a flashing of bright wings in the sunlight, and the sound of many scolding little voices.

Two frightened little men jumped: two splashes in the brook told where they had gone. Above and around the cherry-stone were little fairy figures. Each had glossy wings of green and blue, with strange round markings like wide-open eyes.

Slowly, but surely, the cherry-stone was rolled and lifted back to safety, and there, still near the brook's edge, within a little hollow in the moist, soft earth, the cherry-stone was put to bed and covered up.

Soon a tiny green shoot peeped from the brown earth, and the fairies kept soft moss around it so that the sun might not wither it. The tiny shoot grew and grew, and there were leaves on its slender twigs. Still the fairies tended it, and brought clear water from the brook.

IT was a tree now, and pink buds showed themselves on the branches. Then, in the early morning, the fairies gathered around the tree, and were glad that their tree was strong enough to live and grow without their care. And as the fairies danced beneath the little tree, the pink buds opened, and the soft spring wind sang softly to the bright-winged fairy folk.

Wealth of sweetness keeping Locked within a shell;
'Neath the brown earth sleeping;
Breaks its prison cell.

Unto day unfolding
Tiny leaves of green—
Hands too small for holding—Sunbeams slip between.

Blossom-branches swaying—
Home of bird and bee—
O'er the fairies playing
'Neath their cherry-tree.

And the tree was growing, the branches were spreading, and the whispered song of the wind was like a lullaby.

The fairies faded from sight, and with them went the little cherry-tree and Fairyland. But in its place there was the garden again with its great cherry-tree. One spreading branch, like a pink parasol, shadowed a spot where lay two sleeping children, Oya and Toto, in dreams still wandering in Fairyland.

Across the little wooden bridge, came quiet Oyama San, their mother, who knew just where her little ones would be. As she stood for a moment, watching, above and around the children there was the flashing of bright butterfly-wings of glossy green and blue with round eye-marks on each.

Perhaps they were just butterflies, but they were, too, to quiet, quaint Oyama San, the Fairies of the cherry-tree within the Fairyland of Every-Day.

Oya half opened sleepy eyes, and one might have heard her dreamy whisper:

"And the wind is singing, singing—
O'er the fairies playing 'neath their cherry-tree."

A Home-Made Gray Hair Remedy

You can prepare a simple mixture at home that will gradually darken gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. To a half-pint of water add 1 ounce of bay rum, a small box of Orlex Compound and ¼ ounce of glycerine.

These ingredients can be bought at any drug store at little cost, or the druggist will put it up for you. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. This will make a gray-haired person look many years younger. It is easy to use, does not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.

The Hymnology of Easter

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

THIS year Passion Week and Eastertide fall so early that their connection in the calendar with the vernal equinox, as established in the fourth century, by the Council of Nicea, is not distinctly perceptible in this northern zone; much less its traditional association with the ancient festival of spring, and bird-nesting time, which survives in the general custom of eating eggs on Easter morn. But, as most readers are aware, Eastertide has definite seasonal associations with spring in those European countries where its celebration arose during the early centuries of the Christian era. Indeed, it was the clear analogy between the idea of the Resurrection, and the yearly phenomenon of Nature's rebirth which had been celebrated in pagan communities for unnumbered centuries before the birth of Jesus, that won for the feast such immediate acceptance as Christianity spread westward and northward in the dominions of the Roman Empire. Of festivals of any kind, music from time immemorial has always been an auxiliary.

For any choirmaster it would be but emphasizing the obvious to speak of the close associations between music and Eastertide. In most churches of any pretensions, preparations for a fitting celebration of the day with song, begins some weeks before it actually arrives, and in the larger towns and cities the lure of music brings many backsliders back to church for that day at least, and perhaps in the case of some leads to permanent renewal of neglected duties in which they were reared. Associated with Easter music, of which the key-note is rejoicing, there has grown up in most Christian churches, a large volume of musical literature, more solemn in purport, relating to Good Friday and Passion Week. In contrasted phases music has therefore a great deal to do with the modern Christian celebration of both the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. Especially during the nineteenth century, when there was a great and fruitful movement in the motherland to widely extend the use of music in connection with worship, did the volume of special hymns and anthems increase, and to-day every choir has a wealth of appropriate literature upon which to draw. Nevertheless, it would be unjust to overlook the fact that some of the familiar hymns which will be sung by countless congregations this coming Easter Sunday are many centuries old.

FOR instance, two of the hymns of Good Friday and Easter, which appear in the Book of Common-praise, published by the Church of England, in Canada, and which are also in use by other denominations, are from the Latin of Fortunatus, and are therefore some fifteen hundred years old. One of these is the Passion hymn, "See the Destined Day Arise, See a Willing Sacrifice," and the other the more familiar Easter hymn, "Hail! Festal Day to Endless Ages known." In English, the first-named hymn dates back only to 1837, when it was translated by Bishop Mant, and the latter, but to 1884, when it was rendered into our language by Rev. T. A. Lacey. Fortunatus may be considered the earliest writer of hymns for these occasions, whose identity is known. He was so important a figure in his day that a fact or two about him is worth recalling. His full name was Venantius Honorius Clementianus Fortunatus, and he was a native of Treviso, Italy, born in 530 A.D. He studied at Milan and Ravenna, and in course of time became recognized as one of the leading rhetoricians, and the chief Latin poet of his time. His day was that of the decline of the Roman Empire, when Western Europe was breaking up into many small kingdoms, and he seems to have won favor with various Frankish potentates by writing verses in their honor. In 599 A.D., on the verge of his seventieth year, he was created Bishop of Poitiers in France, and died in that office, 609 A.D. In all, in addition to writing lives of many of the saints in prose he composed eleven books of verse including many hymns, sincere in feeling and fine in imagery. And through these hymns, he, courtier, scholar and prelate of the so-called dark ages, survives in lands like our own that were undreamed of when he died.

Those who look into the hymnology of Good Friday and Easter, cannot but be struck with the manner in which nearly all the epochs since Christianity became a widely recognized religion, are represented both in the verses, and the airs to which they are rendered. Apart from Fortunatus, other old Latin writers have supplied origins for modern hymns. From such a source comes the hymn translated in 1842, "In the Lord's Atoning Grief." Another, "Glory be to Jesus, Who in Bitter Pains," comes from the early Italian. On the other hand, one of the most beautiful, "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," is purely English, written in 1707, by Rev. Isaac Watts, and usually sung to Edward Miller's melody, "Rockingham," which dates from 1790. From the ancient Latin comes a hymn not unfrequently sung, "O Sacred Head Surrounded by a Crown of Piercing Thorns," and the most appealing of the two or three tunes to which it is sung from a Passion Chorale by H. L. Hassler, composed in 1601. The old Lutheran chorales have indeed supplied a goodly number of lyrics to English hymnology not only for Easter, but for other religious seasons. But many of the very finest hymns for both Good Friday and Easter, are purely British. For instance, "I see the Crowd in Pilate's Hall," is by Rev. Horatius Bonar, and little more than sixty years old. One of the finest of these hymns in literary conception, "Hark, the Voice of Love and Mercy, Sounds Abroad From Calvary," goes back to the latter part of the eighteenth century, and was written by Rev. Jonathan Evans. The middle years of the nineteenth century saw a great flowering of religious verse for all seasons by clergymen of high literary attainments and some of the best of the English ecclesiastical composers, including Sir Arthur Sullivan, who was a man skilled in many fields of music, provided the airs.

SINGULARLY enough the authorship of the most widely popular of all Easter hymns, "Jesus Christ is Risen To-day! Alleluia," is unknown. It came into use anonymously in 1749, and the tune to which it is usually sung dates back to 1708, but the composer is also unknown. In the old books of airs this melody was merely known as "Easter Hymn." But it is in reality but an adaptation of an earlier poem, precisely similar in form, though not in text, written in 1739 by Rev. Charles Wesley, brother of the founder of Methodism, who made his phrases to fit the old tune of 1708. "Christ the Lord is Risen Again," somewhat similar in thought, was translated in 1858 by Caroline Winkworth, from an old German writer named Weiss, and the tune "Wurtemberg," to which this and many another hymn is sung goes back to 1694. Another immortal Easter hymn, "The Strife is O'er, the Battle Done," comes from the Latin, and in English dates back only sixty years; the two tunes to which it may be sung at choice, are both ancient; the one a very old French provincial melody; the other by Palestrina, the sixteenth century Roman composer.

Orange Jelly Makes a Different Dessert—

ORANGE JELLY

(Seven to Nine Persons)

|                           |                                |
|---------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 1 envelope Cox's Gelatine | 1 cup (½ lb.) sugar            |
| 1 ½ cups (¾ pint) water   | 1 ½ cups (¾ pint) orange juice |
|                           | 1 lemon                        |

Grate rinds of two oranges into saucepan, add Gelatine, sugar and water and dissolve over fire; add orange and lemon juices and strain into a wet mold. Chill in a cool place and turn out when firm.

This jelly is sometimes served in orange shells as follows: Remove a small piece from top of orange; scoop out pulp with a small spoon; chill shells and fill with jelly. Cut in halves or quarters when firm.

Jellies, puddings, desserts, salads—all are made richer and more delicious by the use of Cox's Gelatine. Pure, unflavored and unsweetened, Cox's makes an excellent base for many delightful and unusual recipes. You will recognize Cox's by the distinctive checker-board box. Look for it at your grocer's.

—Longfellow.

THE older we grow, the more tenderly do we dwell on those "Golden Milestones" of which Longfellow wrote—unforgettable incidents which marked epochs in our lives.

Recall the memorable day when someone gave you a watch! Perhaps you were a schoolboy, a girl graduate, a youth leaving home to make your way in the world. Whatever the occasion, the long-coveted watch gave you a new sense of assurance and consequence.

The world does not change. To-day, just as fifty years ago, Elgin Watches are punctuating the years in the lives of young and old. And as the months of 1921 come and go, you will find here, little human stories of some of those "Golden Milestones" in other people's lives, which are being marked by that gift—unrivalled as a suitable token of the passing of Time—an Elgin Watch.

The Hymnology of Easter

For many of the more familiar Easter hymns like "Alleluia! Alleluia! Hearts to Heaven, and Voices Raise," "Come Ye Faithful Raise the Strain," "Christ is Risen, Christ is Risen," and "Welcome Happy Morning," Sullivan made settings. His career in all its branches is too well known to require comment, but there are two of his contemporaries, Sir John Stainer, and Rev. John Bacchus Dykes who were also fertile in this field. Sir John Stainer indeed may be said to have made the Passion and Resurrection peculiarly his own as a subject of musical expression, and his name as a composer survives chiefly through the religious celebrations in connection therewith. His "Seven Last Words," a cantata, is done yearly in Passion Week by countless churches of various denominations throughout the English speaking world. He was born in 1840, and died in 1901, was a Musical Doctor of Oxford, and in 1872, became organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. In 1888 his religious music led Queen Victoria to confer on him the honor of knighthood and in his latter years he was professor of music at his alma mater, Oxford. The peculiar sincerity and fervor of his music, especially that for Eastertide have given it lasting importance. Rev. John Bacchus Dykes, whose name is permanently identified with English hymnology for all seasons, was educated for the Church, and took up musical composition as a recreation; he was born in 1823 and became a minor canon and precentor at Durham Cathedral in 1849. Subsequently he qualified for the degree of Musical Doctor at Oxford, only awarded to composers of original works. He died in 1876, and is best remembered for the melody of "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," and for the ceremonial hymn sung in Anglican churches "for those in peril on the sea"; but his Easter hymns are also admirable.

It may be said that most of the finer order of hymn composers get their inspiration from Johann Sebastian Bach, than whom no musician who ever lived was more deeply imbued with the spiritual meanings of Christian doctrines and traditions. He not only composed two great ensemble works for the occasion: the "John Passion," based on the text of the gospel of St. John, and the "Matthew Passion," embodying that of St. Matthew, but his short cantata for single voices and a few instruments, is replete with treatments of the Easter narrative. Recently I heard one of them, "Come Holy Cross," which treats of the action of Simon of Cyrene, who bore to Calvary the Cross the Savior was too exhausted to carry. Simon sings of his joy in being able to assist his master, and the accompaniment is remarkably suggestive of a man stumbling along under a heavy burden. Great as the music of Bach is, its difficulty is too marked for general use. There is in truth no popular musical work of vast dimensions that stands in the same relation to the Feast of Easter, as does Handel's "Messiah" to that of Christmas; but forty years ago the French composer, Charles Gounod, made a very creditable attempt in "Redemption," which contains some noble passages. It is interesting to note that "Redemption" may be classed as in a measure a British work, for it was made to English text with a specific view toward British festival performances; and was familiar to the British public before it was done in France.

Margaret Takes Some Time Off

she heard it thump. "Now they're reading the notice for the postman; Ta-Ta, old dear," she laughed as she turned on her side and drifted off in reality.

Next day she washed her hair and Bobby's, the rain barrel and two basins making fine fun of it. Hair dry, she initiated Bobby into the mysteries of calisthenics, and while he played at them she worked and relaxed alternately till the soft, sleepy glow through her veins made fatigue of this kind in the balmy air a positive enjoyment. Every day there was something new to be done. How many reserves her garden held! And then she hurriedly glanced at magazines for months back, Margaret had time for them now, and how she did revel!

Two days were rainy, once Bobby almost insisted on going down town for ice cream, another fateful day someone from across the way came and looked over the back fence inquisitively. Margaret and Bobby fortunately being behind a sheltering bush and Margaret hushing the little lad with no uncertain forefinger. One creepy night Margaret was sure that she heard a burglar. She had always laughed at the idea of being afraid to stay alone in the house, and had really meant it, for when not tired to the point of extinction she was not troubled with nerves. In the morning she found that the wind had loosened a shutter so she was able to laugh with Bobby over the "boo-man."

When the time seemed a little long in the last week she consoled herself by going to the glass and having a look. She must have gained several pounds, she really must have! And wasn't she lovely and brown, and weren't her eyes bright! She could hardly wait to see old Robert. She would keep him guessing—just! Serve him right for not giving her an address to write to him nor asking her where she was going!

And her cheque! She hugged herself. At the last of the three weeks she and Bobby were "coming back." She would get her char-woman for a couple of days and give the house the "once over," and then the city! Robert had intended her to have a good time on the cheque, and she was going to have it, even if not quite along the lines he had prescribed.

The day of her outburst seemed a long time ago, and then she sat down and considered herself seriously. Was she really better, really fit for the everyday nagging routine, or would she go on for a few weeks or months and then back to a similar crisis?

MARGARET SUMMERS was confronted with what numbers of other women in her own and every other community were facing—how to accomplish more than her strength and training equalled. She had been a bright busy girl with not too much physical reserve but with any amount of energy and ambition. With the coming of her baby and the drag of a household in a small community where help was limited to a thankfully-received char-woman, in the effort not to get behind in her outside interests, she had been drawing too largely on her reserve strength and she knew that she would be doing it again in a short while unless something out of the ordinary took place.

How to make it take place? That was her problem. She had had time to think during these sunny lazy days. She did not want Robert to have a nervous frump of a wife in a few years. She was certainly far better off than many other women who had more cares and even less means than she. She took her head in her hands and gave it an energetic shake with a characteristic "let's work it out!"

She sat still so long that Bobby began to think that Muvver was having an extra nap and tugged at her braid with a will. She peeked through her fingers, then tossed him up with a little laugh. "All set, Bobby," she said, "you and Muvver are going on a really truly trip to-day, let's go get on some Christian clothes!"

Having made the short trip to the corner grocery and through the telephone there got her own re-connected,

How Pretty Teeth are ruined during sleep

When you retire with a film on your teeth, it may all night long do damage.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. The tooth brush does not remove it all.

That film causes most tooth troubles. So millions find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay.

How film destroys

Film absorbs stains and makes the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Few escape its damage. So dental science has for years been seeking a film combatant.

New methods found

Now ways have been found to fight film and film effects. Able authorities have proved them. The ways are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. Leading dentists everywhere advise it. And millions of people every day enjoy its benefits.

Watch it for ten days

This offers you a 10-Day Tube. Get it and watch its effects.

Each use of Pepsodent brings five desired effects. The film is attacked in two efficient ways.

It multiplies the salivary flow. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

It also keeps teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily adhere.

These five effects, attained twice daily, have brought to millions a new era in teeth cleaning.

Send the coupon for the 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Judge by what you see and feel. Our book will tell the reasons. This is too important to neglect. Cut out the coupon now.

Two On the Trail

left the shores of the wider part of the lake, the bulb of the gourd, were, in unexpected contrast to the bareness of the uplands, heavily wooded with great cottonwood trees and spruce. A grassy islet ringed with willows seemed to be moored here like the barge of some woodland princess. Away beyond, elevated on a grassy terrace at the head of the lake, and overlooking its whole expanse, stood a tiny weather-beaten shack, startlingly conspicuous in that great expanse of untouched nature. Sheltered by the hills from the howling blasts of the prairie above; and with wood, water and unlimited game at its door, it was a wholly desirable situation for a Northern dwelling—but it was seventy-five miles off the trail.

The girl brought her pony alongside Mabyn's; and slipped her hand into his. "It is jus' right!" she whispered. "We will be ver' happy, 'Erbe't!'"

He let her hand fall carelessly. "It's damn lonesome!" he grumbled.

All the shy boldness of an enamored girl peeped out of Rina's eyes, as she whispered: "I'm glad it's lonesome! I don't want nobody to come—but you!"

Mabyn was unimpressed. He struck the ribs of his tired pony with his heels. "Come on," he said; and led the way down the incline.

Later, reaching the shack, on the threshold Rina spread out her arms with an unconscious gesture. "This is my home!" she cried. "I will jus' love it!"

Mabyn looked around at the gaping walls, the empty panes and the foul litter, and laughed jeeringly at her simplicity.

The girl was too happy to feel the sting. "I will fix it!" she said stoutly. "I will mak' it like an outside house. It will be as nice than the priest's parlor in the Settlement!" She clasped her hands against her breast in the intensity of her eagerness. "Jus' you wait, 'Erbe't! Some day I will have white curtains in the window! and a piece of carpet on the floor! and a holy picture on the wall! Oh! I will work so hard!"

"Get about the supper, Rina," said Mabyn shortly.

She prepared the meal at the rough mud fireplace built across the corner of the shack, for they had no stove; and they ate squatting on the floor in the breed fashion, for neither was there a table. Afterward Mabyn dragged the bench—a relic of the former tenant, and sole article of furniture they possessed—outside the door; and sat upon it, smoking, yawning, looking across the lake with lack-lustre eyes.

Rina having tidied the shack, came to the doorway, where she stood looking at him wistfully. Finally she hovered toward him and retreated; and her hands stole to her breast. She was longing mightily to sit beside him; but she did not dare. In a breed's wife it would have been highly presumptuous and would have been very likely rewarded with a blow; but Rina had a dim notion that a white man's wife had the right to sit beside him—still she was afraid. In the end her desire overcame her fears; drifting hither and thither toward the bench like a frond of thistle-down, she finally alighted on the edge, and her cheek dropped on his shoulder. The act must have been subtly suggested by the tincture of white blood in her veins, for it is not a red-skin attitude. The man neither repulsed nor welcomed her.

"'Erbe't," she whispered, "my head is so full of things I am near crazy wit' thoughts! And my tongue is in a snare; I cannot speak at all!"

Mabyn's only comment was a sort of grunt, which meant anything—or nothing.

Rina was encouraged to creep a little closer. "Oh, 'Erbe't, I love you!" she whispered. "I am loving you every minute! I so glad you marry me, 'Erbe't!"

The man took his pipe out of his mouth, and uttered his brief, jeering cackle of laughter. "That wasn't altogether a matter of choice, my girl," he said. "It was a little preliminary insisted on by your father and mother."

Rina hardly took the sense of this "But you do love me, 'Erbe't? Jus' a little?" she pleaded.

"You're all right, Rina," he said patronizingly. "I never was one to make much of a fuss about a woman."

Little by little gathering courage, she began to pour out her soul for the man she loved. "I never love any man but you, 'Erbe't," so ran the naive confession; "the breed boys, they always come aroun' and show off. I not lak them. They foolish and dirty; they eat same lak cocouche; and they know not'ing; but they think themself so fine. They mak' me sick! My mot'er say to me; 'You eighteen year old, Rina; w'en you go to marry?' I say to my mot'er, 'I never marry a pig-man; I want to stay to you.'"

Her voice changed, borrowing the soft, passionate music of the nightingale she had never heard. "Then bam-bye w'en the spring come, an' we pitch by Ostachegan creek, an' the crocus flowers are coming up on Sah-ko-da-tah prairie so many as stars in the sky—then you come by our camp, 'Erbe't; and you so poor an' sick I feel ver' bad for you! An' you talk so pretty, and know so much, my heart him fly straight out of my breast like a bird, 'Erbe't; an' perch on your shoulder; an' him go everywhere you go; an' I got no heart any more. I empty lak a nest in the snow-time!"

"So you stay to us," she went on, "and I mad to see all the men mock at you, an' treat you bad, an' mak' you eat after all have finished, and mak' you lie outside the fire. They t'ink themselves better than a white man, hey! All the time you ask me to come away from the camp with you; an' you t'ink I don' want to come, but you don't know. Many, many nights I not sleep, 'Erbe't. I want so bad to come to the o'ter side of the tepee where you are, but I hold to my mot'er's blanket!"

The man looked up. "H'm! You did, eh?" he exclaimed. "If I had known!"

"But I t'ink I mos' not let you see I love you. So I mak' show I don' care at all. An' it hurt me ver' moch in my empty breast, 'Erbe't. But why I do it?—I want you so to marry me! an' bam-bye you marry me; an' I so scare' and happy lak I was lose my head! Four days I married now! You not mad at me, 'Erbe't, 'cause I mak' you marry me?"

He shrugged. "What's the diff?" he said carelessly.

Rina dared to let her arm creep around his shoulders. "But bam-bye you ver' glad you marry me," she whispered. "For I mak' me ver' nice! I white woman now. I go no more to the breeds. I spik only Engliss now; we will sit in chairs and eat pretty with knives and forks; and always say good morning and good night, lak white people. 'Erbe't, you will teach me all the ways of white people, lak they do outside? I want so bad to be ver' nice, jus' lak white woman!"

"Sure!" said Mabyn vaguely.

Rina was silent for a while. "'Erbe't," she said at last, "you never tell me about your folks; about your house where you live outside. Please tell me."

He muttered, and writhed uncomfortably on the bench. "What's the use of bringing that up?" he said at last. "You wouldn't understand if I tried to tell you."

"Loving makes me onderstan' moch," she softly pleaded.

He was silent.

"Have you any sisters outside, 'Erbe't?" she gently persisted.

"No," he said.

"Your mot'er, she is not dead?"

"No."

"She mos' be ver' nice, I think."

"She's a lady!" he blurted out.

Rina nodded wisely. "I know what that is," she said. "A lady is a ver' nice woman." Her voice dropped very low. "'Erbe't," she whispered, with infinite, passionate desire in her voice—stroking his cheek, "will you teach me to be a lady?"

He laughed. "You 'tend to your work about the place," he said, "and don't bother your head over that."

Tears slowly welled up in Rina's eyes, and stole one after another down her cheeks. "I do so ver' moch want to be a lady," she whispered, more to herself than to him. He did not know she wept, she was so still.

By and by she raised her head, and shook the tears away. "To-morrow, I will begin to fix things nice for you, 'Erbe't," she said with renewed, soft tenderness.

He vented his hopeless, jeering chuckle. "Nice!" he echoed. "My God, Rina! What are you going to begin on?"

"I show you!" she said eagerly. "I have a whole tanned buckskin my father give to me when I go 'way; and my mot'er, she give silk, all colors. I make seven, eight, maybe ten pairs of glove, with cuffs; and work them with silk flowers! No woman can work so good with silk than me! I work all the time there is light; and when all are done I get forty dollar in trade at the store! And I buy cartridges and traps and grub, and another skin to work. Not any more will you be poor, 'Erbe't!"

"Lord! How will we ever drag out the winter in this God-forsaken spot!" he grumbled—unconsciously shifting the initiative to her shoulders.

Her arm tightened about him. "We will do fine!" she said eagerly. "We will mak' moch money. There is no plentier place for fur; and we will have it all! Me, I can set traps and snares as good as Michel Whitebear. Maybe I will get a silver fox, or a black one. I know the fox! In the spring we will have plenty good credit at the store. We can travel to the Settlement then, and you will not be lonesome. There are many white men. We could stay in the Settlement all summer; and I would cook meals for the freighters and the travellers and mak' more money. I am a good worker, 'Erbe't. Everybody say so!"

Mabyn partly roused himself. "That's not a bad idea," he said. "Under cover of the restaurant, it would be dead easy to run in a little whiskey over the Berry Mountain trail, and make a pot of money."

Rina drew away from him. "I will not help you do that, 'Erbe't," she said quietly.

"You'll do what I tell you to do," he said coolly.

Rina remained silent. Her breast heaved and trembled with terror at her own temerity in defying her husband—but there were both firmness and reproach in her attitude. It was more than the weak Mabyn could bear for long in silence.

"Good God!" he burst out. "Have I married a breed to tell me what I ought to do, and ought not to do? Better learn once for all, my girl, that I'm the head of this outfit, and I mean to do whatever I damned please!"

Rina sat gripping her hands together in her lap to control their trembling. Her head was bowed. "I am only a breed girl," she said. "You are my 'osban', and you can beat me, and you can kill me, but I would not cry out, or think bad of you. But you cannot mak' me help you to mak' a pig of you again. I will mak' you to have good credit, an' to be a rich and strong man, an' you can go back and spit on the poor breeds that mock you before. I will not help you trade in whiskey; whiskey mak' you poor, an' sick, an' crazy!"

Mabyn got up. "God! Women are all alike, white or brown!" he muttered indifferently. "Come on in."

But he had yielded the point. The regeneration of Herbert Mabyn had been undertaken.

The Royal Baking Service

from

The Royal Educational Department

Editor's Note—Sandwiches of home baked nut and fruit breads—home made cookies, cup cakes, and muffin surprises—with what youthful glee is each new thing in the dainty mother-packed lunch box pounced upon and devoured!

Not only children but grown-ups too like these unusual sandwiches—appropriate for parties, picnics, long journey lunches, or light Sunday night "sandwich suppers."

Space does not permit giving all the lunch box dainties made up by the Educational Department, but if you want other suggestions for the children's lunches or help in preparing other lunch recipes, as well as a copy of the new Royal Cook Book, write today to the Educational Department, Royal Baking Powder Company, St. Lawrence Blvd., Montreal.

Lunch Delights for Children and Grown-ups

Getting the Right Combination

JUST what to put in the children's lunch box—getting a wholesome yet different combination five days out of seven is a puzzle indeed! Each lunch should include a meaty sandwich, a refreshing drink, and a sweet; any of the following with a glass of milk or a cup of hot cocoa makes a light but adequate lunch:—

- 1 Date bread sandwiches spread with butter or cream cheese, peanut cookies, orange.
- 2 Peanut butter bread sandwiches spread with butter, orange cup cake, apple.
- 3 Biscuit sandwiches with chopped chicken, banana, two or three pieces of fudge.
- 4 Biscuit sandwiches with crisp lettuce, cup custard, filled cookies.

Things That Children Love to See

THE unexpected always pleases children and a new cookie, muffin, or a paper of candies, included in the lunch will delight them.

A Muffin Surprise—Put a tablespoon of muffin batter into a tin. Place a stoned date, a piece of pineapple, a stewed apricot, or a bit of red jelly in center. Cover with another tablespoon of batter and bake. What a surprise when the plain muffin is opened!

Cookie Delights—Place one cookie atop another with an in-between stuffing of marshmallow, ground raisins, nut butter, jam, or best of all, ground figs!

New Biscuit Ideas

For Sandwiches—Instead of ordinary bread, nice crispy biscuits make delightful variations. They are delicious with almost any filling, and with grated maple or brown sugar are wholesome and especially popular with children.

Cinnamon Buns—Spread the thinly rolled biscuit dough with butter, sprinkle with cinnamon and brown sugar, roll like jelly roll, and cut in one and one-half inch slices and bake.

Filled Biscuits—Roll biscuit dough thin, cut, butter, spread with ground raisins, put another biscuit on top, press edges together, and bake.

Tart—Roll dough thin, cut hole in center of one biscuit, place on top of another buttered biscuit, press together. Fill each with stewed cranberries or other fruit and bake into a lovely lunch tart!

Now for Packing the Lunch!

THE daintiest lunch in the world can be spoiled in packing. Cut sandwiches thin and into "lady fingers" or attractive pieces easy to eat, and wrap each individually in wax paper. A covered jelly glass or screw top jar nicely holds a baked apple; a custard or chocolate pudding can be packed in the cup in which it was baked, and don't forget the spoon!

Remember, too, that boys hate to fuss with desserts if compelled to carry a cup or spoon home; an apple or other raw fruit is better for the boy's lunch box.

Cut these out and Paste in Your Cook Book

Biscuit Sandwiches

- |                                 |                  |
|---------------------------------|------------------|
| 2 cups flour                    | 1½ teaspoon salt |
| 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |                  |
| 2 tablespoons shortening        | ¾ cup milk       |

Sift together flour, baking powder, salt; add shortening; rub it in very lightly; add liquid slowly; roll on floured board to about one-half inch thick (handle little as possible); cut out biscuits. Bake in quick oven 15 to 20 minutes. When cold, split, butter, and fill as desired.

Peanut Cookies

- |                                 |                        |
|---------------------------------|------------------------|
| 1 cup flour                     | ½ cup sugar            |
| ½ teaspoon salt                 | ¼ cup milk             |
| 2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |                        |
| 2 tablespoons shortening        | 1 egg                  |
| 1 cup chopped peanuts           | 1 teaspoon lemon juice |

Sift dry ingredients together. Add melted shortening to beaten egg. Add milk and lemon juice, and mix well with the dry ingredients to make soft dough. Add peanuts; mix well and drop with teaspoon on greased pan. Bake in moderate oven about 20 minutes. This recipe makes about four dozen small cookies and requires 1 quart peanuts.

Whole Wheat Fruit Bread

- |                                 |                    |
|---------------------------------|--------------------|
| 2 cups whole wheat flour        | 2 cups white flour |
| 1 teaspoon salt                 | ¼ cup sugar        |
| 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |                    |
| ½ cup molasses                  | ¼ teaspoon soda    |
| 1 pound dates or other fruit    | 2 cups milk        |

Sift together white flour, sugar, salt and baking powder; add to whole wheat flour. Add fruit, chopped fine. Add milk. Add molasses and soda beaten till foamy. Bake in one large or two small greased loaf pans, in slow oven about 1 hour. For tea or reception sandwiches, add 1 cup chopped nuts to above recipe.

Scotch Fingers

- |                                 |                |
|---------------------------------|----------------|
| 2 cups rolled oats              | ¼ cup sugar    |
| 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder |                |
| ½ teaspoon salt                 | ¼ cup molasses |
| 1½ tablespoons melted butter    | ¼ cup milk     |

Grind in the food chopper rolled oat, mix with salt, baking powder, and sugar. Stir in milk, molasses and butter. Mix well. Roll out in a very thin sheet, and cut into narrow oblongs. Flour board with ground rolled oats. Bake 20 minutes in moderate oven.

The BALANCED VARNISH

The difference between
"61" FLOOR VARNISH
and Other Varnishes—

THE difference between "61" and ordinary varnishes lies in the fact that "61" is a finely "balanced" varnish. Its qualities are so "balanced" that it possesses the maximum combined degree of wear-resistance and water-resistance.

Some varnishes wear fairly well. Some resist water. "61" wears longer than so called "waterproof" varnishes and resists water, cold or hot, for a length of time that it has never been called upon to meet in actual use.

"61" was gradually evolved through a period of over thirty years' experiment and research, in balancing one desirable characteristic against another desirable but technically opposing characteristic.

That is why "61" is heel-proof, marproof and water-proof. The remarkable durability of "61" on floors is the reason for its wide use on furniture, woodwork, linoleum and for all household purposes. "61" stains and varnishes in one operation. The beautiful "61" wood stain colors flow off the brush without streaks, laps or brush marks.

Send for color card and panel finished with "61." Try the hammer test on the panel. The wood may dent but the varnish won't crack.

Seriously Considering the Four Walls of a Room

many colors. Italy and Spain were important seats of its manufacture, though it was also carried on to some extent in England. Canvas, painted to imitate tapestries, was also another popular form of wall-covering, and many of the great artists of Italy devoted their skill to produce beautiful compositions for this purpose.

WALL-PAPER did not come into common use in Europe until the Eighteenth Century, though it had been employed at a much earlier period by the Chinese who claim its origin. A few rare examples do, perhaps, exist in England, which may be traced back to the Sixteenth Century; these were imitations of fine old Florentine and Genoese cut velvet. However, machinery for the production of paper in long strips was not invented until the end of the Eighteenth Century, and up to that time the industry was handicapped by the difficult method of printing the paper in small square pieces which were hand-made and were expensive and very difficult to hang. The greatest advance in the production of wall-paper came in the Nineteenth Century by William Morris and his school.

It is perhaps a helpful idea to ponder on the importance which has been attached to the decoration of walls for many centuries past, before we airily make a selection of hangings for our own homes. Wall-paper is, after all, something with which we have to live, and life will be much more agreeable and unconsciously harmonious if we surround ourselves with what is beautiful and in keeping. The effect of ill-chosen and unsuitable paper in a room is likely to be responsible for the development of "nerves" to an alarming extent, though the sufferer may not know what is causing them. We have doubtless all experienced the feeling of irritation that comes from sitting in a small room, the walls of which are covered with a paper in a ponderous pattern that seems to weigh down upon our very heads, and the sense of relief in finding ourselves once more in an open space. Doctors are careful for their patients in this detail, as the result of many a high temperature has been traced to a glaring paper on the wall.

There is considerable responsibility therefore, attached to the choice of wall-paper for a room, and several important points must be taken thought of before a final decision is made. First, there is the room itself to consider—its size, shape, lighting and character. Considering size first, if a room has the effect of appearing too large and "barn-like," the feeling may be greatly lessened by the introduction of a wall-covering in a large design, the color of which radiates warm tones such as brown, terra-cotta or old gold, these having the effect of drawing the walls together and diminishing the sense of space. On the other hand, a small room may be made to appear to have greater proportions by the use of paper of small design, or even plain paper, and cool, receding colors such as blues or greens should be employed. As for the shape of a room, one with many angles or curves should be carefully treated so that these irregularities are not emphasized but brought into harmony with the whole.

Poor lighting is very often responsible for making a room unlivable, and we often find that one which should be of especial use in the house, is being avoided by the entire family, on account of this defect. It is remarkable what an improvement may be effected by a change of wall-paper. The cold, north light which gave the room its chilling atmosphere may be almost entirely counteracted by the use of a paper which radiates light and cheer, such as one containing shades of tan or yellow or a glow of rose, and presently it will be found that this room becomes the most pleasant and delightfully habitable in the house.

THE character of a room is, of course, of the first importance, as there are many papers manufactured that are especially suitable for each apartment. For instance, a room that is to be used as a sitting-room, and is likely to be often inhabited, will be much more successful if wall-paper of a clear, defined design is employed rather than one which is covered with paper containing a riot of pattern and color.

One must have regard also, for pictures. Should a room be designed to contain many of these, a paper which will serve as an effective background is a proper choice and not one which will in any way detract from their decorative value or distract the attention from the higher form of art.

It has been the experience of experts that the best selection of paper can only be made by hanging a strip of the paper on the wall for which it is intended. For this reason, it is well to arrange with your dealer or your decorator to send you a number of rolls of the paper which you have provisionally chosen, that you may actually see their effect within your room. It is difficult even for one greatly experienced, to visualize correctly any one paper in a particular setting, and many mistakes may be avoided by the method suggested. It will be found that, though considerable trouble is given the decorator in demanding this, he is glad to give you his co-operation, for as well as desiring to increase his business, the modern decorator takes a keen interest in the artistic standard which he tries to maintain, and it is to his advantage when a successful design has been chosen. On the other hand, though the decorator may be an artist in his line, it is not always wise to be altogether swayed by his advice or suggestions. Exert your individuality when choosing your paper. Be cautious in making your decision, but when it is made adhere to it. It is well also to keep an open mind in the matter of price and not to allow this detail to influence your choice. A very inexpensive paper may be entirely suitable for some particular room in your home, whereas a more costly and elaborate hanging would be quite out of keeping. On the other hand, it is not to be imagined that paper of a fine quality delightfully printed in a design which is doubtless the work of an artist of high repute, may be purchased for the proverbial song. In discussing the matter of the purchasing public with me, a dealer in wall-papers had that one word of criticism to pronounce. "They will pay anywhere from four to forty dollars a yard for floor covering," he remarked plaintively, "but ask them for a tenth of that cost for a beautiful wall decoration, and they will raise their eyes in horror at the considered extravagance."

AS we suggested in the introductory paragraph, wall-decorations are not chosen to-day with the idea of very great permanency. Indeed, it is perhaps in keeping with modern thought that we have elected to use a more sanitary medium of wall-covering than the dust and germ-laden hangings of an earlier period. Therefore, each year, when we are faced with the necessity of covering our faded or perhaps somewhat soiled walls afresh, we are greeted with a new and delightful variety of papers to choose from. At the present moment, the general trend of house-furnishing calls for such papers as tapestries in rich and luxurious designs, and these are being widely used in halls, living-rooms, dining-rooms, and billiard-rooms; near-plain effects with strappings and borders in various widths to match, are also new, and these have largely taken the

she got in touch with her good old Mrs. Smithers, who was a wonder with a mop and waxing cloth. She pulled up the blinds, viewed the dust with dismay, poked Bobby into his go-cart and made for the Interurban which landed her in the city in twenty minutes.

How hot and dusty it was! Could her cool fragrant garden be so near and yet so far? Her crisp linen dress was beginning to wilt already. "Ice cream, Bobby?" she asked and Bobby was nothing loath.

Margaret's first journey was to a popular business college. She knew the chief instructor and he gladly stole a few moments between classes for a chat. He listened rather amusedly at first while she made the old plea, one for a girl who could help her. She would give her every advantage of a suburban home, she would pay her a moderate wage in return for getting some help with Bobby and the house.

"But my dear Mrs. Summers, don't you know that we have a waiting list of this kind for pupils to choose from, and that half of them come back dissatisfied? They say that there is too much expected of them, too little time for study, etc."

Margaret was thoughtful. "Have you afternoon and morning classes to be taken separately?"

"We have."

"And haven't you a girl who is perhaps in need of a home, or not very strong, who would be willing to take half day classes for the sake of earning something, a country life, and I think a pleasant home?"

The instructor in turn looked thoughtful. He ran over his classes in his mind's eye rapidly and said, "Hum!"

"Well, there's little Bessie Dolan; she's the only one I can think of. She's an orphan, and her aunt is giving her the course, and is really anxious to get rid of her and get her started in life. I could see that when she brought her."

"Do let me talk to Bessie, Mr. Flint. I know that Bessie and I were made for one another from the circumstances!"

So it came about that shy little flower-like Bessie Dolan, of the bright gold hair and serious eyes, who looked fourteen, but who was sixteen her aunt affirmed, accompanied Margaret home on the car, bag and suitcase. It had not taken long to satisfy the Aunt as to credentials or to persuade her to let Bessie take the course more slowly, seeing wages and a home were to be forthcoming in the meantime, and the garden and Margaret's bonny self had been the inducement which made Bessie's eyes sparkle. She was to go to the college for half-day sessions, and the other half was to be Margaret's. Not competent help of course, but steps saved, and Bobby off her mind. "All comes of thinking out what you can do, when you can't do what you want to do, and then going after it," was Margaret's not very lucid comment to herself.

They would have a really fussy little tea after strictly two-year-old-diet. She had laden herself with all kinds of dainties from the city, and to-morrow Robert would be home. Good old Hubby, he knew that she was sorry; he must know! It had been a long time, notwithstanding her garden frolic.

"And then my other plan," she thought, and hugged herself.

Here they rounded the home corner, and there on the front steps, amid Mrs. Smithers' brooms and pails stood Robert, his face as long as the moral law, and how hot and dusty he looked!

With one shriek of welcome, Margaret dropped bundles and boxes for Bessie to tote, and flew up the walk. Robert opened his long arms wide.

"My darling! Have you been at Palm Beach? You blessed brown baby! You plump little darling! Why, you look like that summer we camped!"

"Camped! Huh! Nothing to my holiday! You old thing, you came home a day early, and you're all warm and stuffy; Never mind, there's lots of hot water. Go take a shower. I've got the loveliest love of a supper in these bundles you will ever taste!"

"Who's the small stranger? Tell me everything!"

"Never a tell! Go and bathe and then we'll eat!"

Margaret whistled and hummed as in days of yore, while she moved around the kitchen, while Bobby shrieked with delight outside in the new games with Bessie. She had succeeded. Her holiday had worked, and so would the rest of it. She chuckled; Robert thought he was going to find out! Oh, would he!

So when the good things were eaten, and Robert gathered her on his knee, like the old days, before she was always busy and always tired, he said: "Now, old girl, tell a fellow about it."

She pulled his ear for the "old girl." It would come out it seemed, but it didn't jar to-day some way.

"First of all, will you save me every Thursday, unless you are to be out of town, have dinner with me in the city as my guest, not come home at noon that day, and do something that we both will like in the evening?"

"Hands up," shouted Robert, "the poor-house for ours!"

"Not at all," said Margaret with dignity. "Here is my bank account," and she produced a little red book with the whole of the generous cheque deposited.

Robert's eyes bulged. "But your holiday! How did you have it?"

"My holiday is going right on till this cheque gives out. Every Thursday—maid's day out—for me. No meals to get that day, a nice little modest dinner in town with my husband and something we want to do in the evening out of my holiday money, and this blessed Bessie to help me with Bobbie. I know she's going to be a treasure."

"I've just been forcing old circumstance's hand, Robert. I might have been grumping around here till the end of time, having hysterics occasionally, and not being fit to speak to. There's sure to be some way, or some person to fit in if one just goes after it. What are you chuckling about? Think it won't last? It will, if this should fail, I'll find some other way, and don't you be superior, didn't I have my holiday, get brown and well, save money and land a co-worker? That will 'hold you' for awhile, Old Boy!"

"The holiday? You just keep right on guessing. You're not even warm yet, and—no, I didn't sponge either myself or Bobby on any of our relatives."

Out Of the North

Here and there, the threshers are at work converting the stooks into grain, but the farmers, this year, are declaring that, hereafter, they shall have community threshing machines because they are mulcted as high as sixteen cents a bushel by the threshermen.

In spite of the horrible happenings of last year, when thousands of cattle died of starvation, many of the farmers are burning their straw stacks on the fields. There is a name for these men but my knowledge of a certain clause in the criminal code which prohibits the use of insulting and abusive language in public places, prevents my putting it down. You, however, may think of it if you care to.

There are people who claim that there is too much unoccupied land in the western provinces and that only an amount equal to the roads has been cultivated. They say we need immigrants to help lower the taxes; to help pay the railway deficit of sixty million dollars a year; and to produce more food for the world's consumption.

Yet, curiously enough, while we are seeking immigrants, our own people are emigrating to other lands. In 1919, nearly 60,000 Canadians left this Dominion to settle in the United States.

Ask Men What Pie They Like

—See How Many Vote the Raisin

TAKE a vote on pies in your home and you'll make mostly raisin pies. For raisins make a food-dessert that quickly revives spent energies.

Raisins furnish 1560 units of energizing nutriment per pound.

They are 75 per cent. pure fruit-sugar in practically pre-digested form.

So the nutriment of raisin pie is almost immediately assimilated.

Men like the flavor and they feel the strength that this fine dessert imparts.

Try one to-night. You'll never have to ask men what pie they like thereafter. Here's the tested recipe for the chief of pies:

The Juice Forms a Luscious Sauce

|                         |                            |
|-------------------------|----------------------------|
| 2 cups Sun-Maid Raisins | Juice 2 lemons             |
| 1½ cups boiling water   | 1 tbsp. grated lemon rind  |
| 1 cup sugar             | Juice 1 orange             |
| 4 tbsp. cornstarch      | 1 tbsp. grated orange rind |
| 1 cup chopped walnuts   |                            |

Cook raisins in boiling water for five minutes; pour into sugar and cornstarch which have been mixed. Cook until thick; remove from fire and add other ingredients. Bake between two crusts. Walnuts may be omitted if desired.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

Use these raisins for home cooking, for they are the finest raisins grown.

Made from choicest California table grapes, tender, meaty, juicy and thin-skinned.

Three varieties: Sun-Maid Seeded (seeds removed); Sun-Maid Seedless (grown without seeds); Sun-Maid Clusters (on the stem). All dealers sell them.

Two On the Trail

CHAPTER XIV.

THE LAST STAGE.

THE hours of the afternoon that followed their encounter with Tom Lillywhite were long and heavy ones for Natalie and Garth. A haggard misunderstanding rode between them on the trail. Denied the all-explaining, all-healing touch of hands—or lips, the unreasonable despair of lovers seized on each; and the sunny way was plunged in murk. They rode, and camped, and ate their supper in silence; and in silence they turned in for the night. But there was little sleep for either; they lay apart, each nursing a burden of unhappiness; unable to say now what it was all about, only dreadfully conscious that they were divided.

As soon as it was light enough to see, a pale and heavy-lidded Natalie crept noiselessly out of her tent. In front of the door she saw Garth on his knees preparing to build a fire; but the hand that held the hatchet-helve had dropped nervelessly to the ground; and his eyes, fixed and staring in the torpor of miserableness, had forgotten what he had set out to do. At the sight, a rapturous peace came back to Natalie's harried soul; for, she thought, if he were so unhappy as that, he must love her in spite of all. And Garth, looking up, saw the tenderness break in her weary face, and he understood it all too. The forest sprang into leaf again for them; and presently the sun came gaily up. They became as wildly and unreasonably happy as they had just been miserable; and not a word was exchanged either way. It was not necessary. That they did not fling themselves into each other's arms at that moment, must surely be written down to their credit somewhere.

They made but a leisurely progress this day and the next. The labor of the journey was greater than at any time hitherto, for in addition to the ordinary routine of making and breaking camp twice a day, Garth had now the four horses to look after. Catching them was a task of uncertain duration, even though they turned out hobbled; in particular, the exasperating Timoois developed the proficiency of a very circus horse, in walking on his hind legs. And once caught, there was all the business of saddling, packing and drawing the hitch.

Besides, there was that in both their hearts which delayed them even more. No ardently desired goal awaited them at the end of this journey; on the contrary they dreaded what they were to find. The last few miles of the way together, before the inevitable came between them, was therefore very dear; and it became ever easier to say "Let's camp!" and harder to say "Let's move!"

Their boisterous jollity on the trail gave place to much quiet happiness; and there was ceaseless friendly contention, where Garth's every thought was for Natalie; and hers for him. Each was on his mettle to be worthy of the other's best. Above all they avoided the insidious danger of contact; but inevitably sometimes in the business of the camp, their hands did meet—and each to himself stored up and told over the events like secret treasures. In every labor Natalie insisted on taking her share like a man; and Garth never ceasing to upbraid her, yet loved her for it prodigiously.

Day by day, now, the leaves of the more exposed trees were yellowing; and on the second night of their journey across the portage, the first heavy frost of the season descended. Garth, under his sail-cloth at the door of the tent, awoke covered with rime.

Toward the end of the third day they had their never-to-be-forgotten first glimpse of the mighty Spirit, the dream river of the North, whose name evokes the thought of a garden in a bleak land. The unvarying flatness of the portage with its standing pools, and the interminable lofty wood that had hemmed them in for three days, had given them the sense of travelling on the bottom of the world, and that somewhere ahead must be a hill to climb. What then was their astonishment this afternoon, when, without warning, they emerged from among the trees on an abrupt grassy terrace, and beheld the great river lying nearly a thousand feet below.

It was a view inimitably gorgeous and sublime. Coming so suddenly upon it they caught their breaths and gazed in silence; for there was nothing fitting to say. The high point on which they stood overlooked a deep and narrow gorge at their left, through which a little river fell to the great stream; and across this they could look up the vast trough for miles. In the distance the river seemed to rise, until one would say it issued molten from the low-hung sun itself.

It had an individual and peculiar look, like no watercourse they had seen. Its course drew a sharp line between the wooded country and the prairie. Like a figure dressed in motley, the steep southern bank was everywhere dark and wooded, while the other side, sweeping up in countless fantastic knolls and terraces, was bare, except for the brown grass, and patches of scrub-like hair in the hollows. Far back from the opposite rim of the vast trough swept the unmeasured prairie, as flat, in the whole prospect, as the country they had lately traversed.

It was the wealth of color that most of all bewitched their eyes. The river itself was of an odd, insistent green—emerald tinged with milk; the islands on its bosom hung out the rich bottle-green of spruce; the grass on the north bank was beaver-brown; the wild-rose scrub glowed blood-crimson in the hollows; and the aspen bluffs, touched with frost, were as yellow as saffron. The wild and beautiful panorama was made complete in their eyes by a great golden eagle perched on the brink of the immediate foreground and, like themselves, gazing over. Though but a hundred yards or so distant, he contemptuously disregarded their arrival. When Garth, full of curiosity, came closer, he spread his vast wings and drifted indifferently out into space.

For a long time they gazed at the scene without speaking. It was Natalie who finally expressed their common thought.

"Wouldn't it be sweet," she said wistfully, "if our journey had no other object but to see this? With what satisfied hearts we could now turn back!"

Skirting the edge of the steep, presently the Settlement came into view far below, a hut or two along the river, hugging the base of the cliffs. The trail zigzagged gradually down, frequently doubling on itself; and whereas the eagle might have descended in a minute, it promised to be more like half an hour for them.

Garth, following his previous policy, did not intend to expose Natalie to the stares of the Settlement, until he had at least reconnoitred. Before coming on the houses, therefore, he led his little caravan off through the bush to the left; and descended to the shore of the smaller stream they had seen from above. Here, in a private glade beside the noisy brown water, they pitched their camp; and Garth, leaving Natalie armed against all eventualities, proceeded into the Settlement.

His inevitable first question at the store elicited the information that the Bishop had gone up the river to Binchinnin, Ostachegan Creek and Fort St. Pierre. Next, the name of Herbert Mabyon called forth contemptuous shrugs. None of the men could give certain information of his whereabouts, though Clearwater Lake was mentioned again. He had not been in to the post for four months; and there was a handful of letters waiting for him. Garth was referred to the breeds across the river for better news. It was clearly intimated that all self-respecting white men had cast Mabyon off.

HERE'S THE RECIPE

2 cups granulated sugar 2 teaspoons butter
1 cup milk 1/2 teaspoonful Mapleine
Stir butter, sugar and milk until it boils.
Then boil briskly until it forms soft ball in cold water. Take off fire, cool slightly and beat until thick enough to spread on cake.

Mapleine makes instant syrup as well as its incomparable use as a flavoring. Dissolve granulated sugar in hot water and add Mapleine.

Mapleine contains no maple sugar, syrup nor sap, but produces a taste similar to maple.

Two On the Trail

Inquiring the means of crossing the river, the ferry was pointed out to Garth, a barge propelled with sweeps. It must be tracked up-stream for a quarter of a mile before starting across, to allow for the current, he was told. The trader offered to help him when he was ready. Garth thanking him, privately resolved to cross before the Settlement was astir next morning. He saw that his own reticence in answering questions inspired the three simultaneously with the idea that he was a detective from outside, in pursuit of Herbert Mabyn for some early sin; and he let it go at that.

GARTH roused Natalie long before dawn; and they crossed the river by the first greenish light of the East. Garth handled one sweep, Natalie the other; and their labor was great. The incorrigible Timooosis, who never neglected an opportunity to make trouble, balked furiously at the ferry; and, finally driven on board and tied, managed to work the other horses up to a high state of excitement during the passage.

Finally, when they had almost made the other shore, he succeeded in breaking his halter; and, leaping over the stern, perversely struck out for the shore they had left. Cy and Caspar, horses of no character, blindly leaped after him. For a moment a dire disaster threatened; for Timooosis, borne down by the weight of his pack, could scarcely keep his head above water; and they thought they had lost both their horse and their camp equipment. But the self-contained Emmy, who had not budged during all the excitement, merely turned her head, and sent an imperious whinny in the direction of her offspring; whereupon Timooosis, with true coltish inconsistency, turned about, and came meekly swimming after the barge, followed by the other two. Since the shore was not above twenty-five yards off he managed to win it pack and all, and staggered up on the beach, chilled, exhausted, and much chastened in mind. Warned by previous experiences, they never trusted him with anything perishable, so the damage to his pack was slight.

After an hour's travelling, they halted by the trail at sunrise to eat, and to dry out what had been wet. This part of the trail traversed the heavily wooded bottom-lands, before starting to climb the grassy steeps of the further bank. As they sat on a log discussing their bread and cocoa, a rollicking song came, as a sound comes fluctuating through the woods, now from this side, now from that, and curiously deadened. It finally resolved itself into the air of "Ta-ra-boom-de-ay" with words in Cree. While it still seemed some distance away, suddenly the singer rode upon them; and reining up his horse, called the song into his surprised throat.

He was the handsomest native they had met, a young fellow of twenty-odd, lean and broad-shouldered, with flashing black eyes and high-bridged nose. His stiff-brimmed "Stetson" was tilted at a dashing angle; he had a scarlet silk handkerchief about his throat; and he sat his horse like a young prince of the woods. Whether pure redskin or breed it was impossible for them to tell; certainly there was no visible evidence of a white admixture; but in spite of his strange and savage air, there was something instantly likable about the young man—according to Natalie he was the first native they had met who seemed human. He rode a fine black horse as bravely accoutred as would become the captain of a round-up.

He seemed disposed to be friendly; and Garth invited him to share their meal. As politeness demanded, he broke a small piece of bread, and drank some cocoa, which was plainly not at all to his taste. When he sat down he had the grace to take off his hat, something else they had not seen before in a native.

His name, he volunteered, was Gene Lafabe. Since his English was about

A Medley of Thoughts on Gardening

flat or other shallow dish until the plants have developed and become attached to the soil.

Plan the Garden on Paper.

WHETHER in town or country, the principles that govern the planning and planting of a garden are practically the same, although the distance of planting, methods of tillage, intensity and systems of cropping may differ considerably. In any case, the garden scheme should be decided upon before planting time comes. Drawing a plan to scale on paper will help. Take a piece of paper 15 inches wide and 30 inches long for a farm garden, or a smaller piece, if the area to be planted is not large. Represent the garden on the paper to a scale or unit. If every foot of the garden can be drawn on the paper by using the scale of  $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch, the unit of measure is designated as " $\frac{1}{4}$ -inch equals one foot."

Using this unit of measure, first draw the boundaries of the garden, always remembering that each quarter of an inch on the paper represents one foot in the garden. Indicate the direction of the rows, the location and amount of each vegetable to be grown, and also the proper dates for sowing or setting. If a farm garden is being planned, allow room at each end of all rows for turning the horse when cultivating. Place the perennial crops, such as asparagus, rhubarb and horseradish, at one side. Draw rows the proper distance apart for the early, or hardy, crops first, and follow with warmer season crops as the days and weeks go by. Detailed information for each kind of vegetable is given in the planting guide. As far as possible, arrange to plant in the same or adjoining rows, crops that require the same kind of cultivation and care and the same length of season to mature. Plan for a succession of crops, so that the ground may be occupied nearly all the time. Amateur gardeners will plan also a system of double cropping. Space forbids further details, but the enthusiastic vegetable gardener will find the way.

With the Fruits.

MARCH is pruning month. Thin out the old apple and cherry trees. Thin out also the peach, pear and plum trees, and head back about one-third of last season's growth.

No fruit requires more regular and systematic pruning than the grape. One of the main points to observe is to keep the bearing wood as near the trunk as possible. Thin out well, leaving only six or eight limbs to a vine, well placed, each limb with no more than six or seven buds.

Prune currants, gooseberries, raspberries and blackberries. Currants and gooseberries produce their fruit on wood that is at least two years old. Remove only a portion of the old wood, and allow a similar number of new branches to replace same. Cut back the new wood. Remove the old canes from the raspberries and blackberries. Thin out the new canes, and cut back those that remain to about three and one-half feet, depending upon variety and strength of growth.

Fruit trees may be grafted this month and next. Old trees that are not producing desirable varieties may be changed into good ones. Any fruit tree may be made, if desired, to bear a number of varieties.

Spraying should commence just before the buds begin to swell. Scale insects and various kinds of fungous diseases are best controlled at this time. Secure a spray pump of some kind and write to the nearest agricultural college or department of agriculture for directions.

Plan to plant fruit trees, bush fruits, grapes and strawberries, if you have the room; eliminate the tree fruits, if space is comparatively limited; grow a few strawberries anyway on lots where other kinds would crowd. Few homes need be without home-grown fruits of some kind.

Lawns and Shrubberies.

IN localities where the snow leaves early, the lawn may be raked, fertilized and rolled. Grass seed should be purchased for making new lawns and for strengthening the turf of old ones.

Remove all dead wood from shade trees, shrubs and vines; if these are overgrown, they may be thinned out; if unshapely, they may be pruned for correction. Most shrubs require very little pruning. The time to prune depends upon their season of blooming. Early-flowering shrubs should not be pruned until after blossoming. Late flowering shrubs may be pruned now. These include mock orange, some spireas and honeysuckles, Clematis Jackmanni and the large-flowered hydrangea. Last season's growth of the last named should be cut back to about six inches of the old wood.

Prune roses before growth starts. If quantity of bloom rather than quality be the object, the only pruning necessary is to remove the dead and weakly wood, and to cut back the shoots to a point below where the winter has killed the immature growth of the season before. If the object be, and it should be, the promotion of a symmetrical growth and the improvement of quality in bloom, follow the old rule that "plants of a delicate growth should be severely pruned, while those of vigorous growth should have some of the branches cut out entirely and the remaining ones only moderately shortened."

For Flower Garden.

BEFORE selecting seeds and plants for the flower garden, the wide-awake horticulturist usually looks over the field to see what professional men, even many amateurs, have done in the way of introducing new and improved varieties. But most gardeners are satisfied with the old stand-bys. The common annuals, so conspicuously pictured on seed packets in store windows, are just as serviceable for home planting as varieties that cost more and must be ordered direct from the specialist. There's a place for both the new and the old.

To have early bloom from asters, pansies, four-o'clocks, scarlet sage (salvia), nasturtiums, lobelia, sweet alyssum, and many other annuals, and plants treated as annuals, it is necessary to start the seed in a hotbed or in the house long before planting time. A good plan is to sow the seeds in shallow boxes, filled to within half an inch of the top with fine rich earth. Water and keep in the kitchen or living room window where the temperature will be fairly uniform at about 65 degrees. Spray the soil with lukewarm water when the surface appears dry. Sow towards the end of March or early in April. If the very best plants are wanted, transplant when large enough, to other boxes or to a cold frame once before setting outside in the open garden. Some kinds of perennials will bloom the first year, if sown inside or under glass early in March.

Perennials are the pioneers of the flower kingdom. For centuries, one may say, herbaceous flowering plants have been the greatest delight of flower lovers. They are still the favorite class of flowers with many people. And to-day they may be had in great variety and perfection. Perennials should be prominently in mind when planning home beautification this spring.

Thou workest never alone;

May see it and mend his own."

Mrs. Baucher's Sheep

Before the bewildered Ivan could reply, Mrs. Lopatka, who had come in unnoticed intervened.

"Two days ago yet you say that pigs must go up," she said.

"A man can be mistaken," retorted Tonassi.

"Many times are the men mistaken. More better it is when they listen to the women. Good advice I give it to mine daughter, so two days ago we load up the other pigs, and she sell that at Borwick for two hundred and seventy-five dollars. That leaves to you, Ivan, a hundred and sixty dollars after you pay to mine daughter the price of the sheep you and this good-for-nothing steal from her."

At the sight of poor Ivan, standing bewildered there, Mrs. Baucher's anger flamed up against both her mother and the cattle buyer. What right had they to worry her man? After all, the sheep had been hers; it was a matter for her and Ivan to settle between themselves. She gave a most realistic groan.

"Ivan, I—I feel bad," she said, pressing her hand to her side. "I must to lie down. Do you help me to bed."

Mrs. Lopatka started up, concerned, to offer help, but Domka, who had understood the glance her mother threw over her shoulder, diverted her grandmother by asking how a mustard plaster should be made. Tonassi, glad to escape from the keen tongue of the old woman, seized his hat and fled. Mrs. Baucher, alone in her room with her husband, firmly closed the door, abandoned pretence of illness, and began to speak.

When Mrs. Baucher and her husband, having reached a complete understanding, rejoined the family, Mrs. Lopatka was still waiting to attack Ivan on the matter of evening school.

"Sure, mother, we go to school," Mrs. Baucher interrupted her. "With mine own money, that I get for mine sheep, do I pay for mineself and Ivan. What for not, since a man and his wife are all the same one person?"

But from that day Mrs. Baucher was more independent, while Ivan showed greater respect for his wife's judgment, as well as for her property rights.

place of what was known as "oatmeal paper." They have all its qualifications together with a pleasing decorative appearance. Cretonnes, chintzes and charming silk effects are at present most popular for bedrooms. In ceilings, also, a change is apparent, and the "moire ceiling," which has been in vogue for the past twenty years has given way to new designs in harmony with the remainder of the room. Attractive ceiling papers are being shown which introduce a note of color, the designs exhibiting mostly clusters of flower petals which form dainty motifs, delicate checks, polka dots or stipples.

The children's rooms have not been overlooked, and lovely papers are created expressly for this purpose with pictures illustrative of well-known nursery rhymes appearing on a plain ground. These are quaint and well-drawn and are not allowed to be monotonous but of sufficient variety to interest the young mind.

In Canada, the manufacture of wall-paper has shown a great advancement in the past six years, and we now possess four large and thriving factories, two in Toronto, and two in Montreal. These are producing some of the finest wall-papers that are made to-day; indeed, their trade is not restricted to the home market, but exports of Canadian wallpapers are now being made to many of the largest countries of the world.

Childhood is a Garden

A CHILD has been compared to a garden—fertile ground for good-habit flowers or bad-habit weeds.

In mother's keeping rests the fate of these little gardens. She should plant early the seed of sound habits of health; particularly the good habit of regular and thorough elimination of food waste. For of all the habits learned in childhood, this is by far the most important in safeguarding the child against illness and promoting its health all through life.

Particularly valuable for children

Nujol is particularly valuable for relieving Constipation in children; for instead of forcing or irritating the system, Nujol simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system.

Nujol thus prevents constipation because it helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world. It is absolutely harmless, does not upset their little stomachs, cause griping nor interfere with their school or play. And they like it.

Leading medical authorities agree that over 75% of human illness has its origin in unnatural conditions in the intestinal tract—in constipation—and prescribe Nujol particularly for children.

CONSTIPATION.

THERE are very few people who come to consult The Family Physician, who can truly say:

"No," to the question:

"Do you suffer from constipation?"

People who are quite free from this defect are usually perfectly well. The cure lies with the patient and not with the physician. It is a matter of daily habit and the foundation of that regular daily habit should be laid when the baby is about three months old. Modern books on the care of infants and young children, if they are to be really useful to the Mother, should point out just how this can be done. And if any reader of this page cannot get the necessary information from books or otherwise, address a letter to The Family Physician and perhaps in some forthcoming number of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, we shall be able to take space to answer any question you wish to ask on this subject.

However, we must begin with you, whoever you are, at the age that you have now attained. And therefore the question we must answer is not what might have been done for you when you were three months old, but what can be done for you now. There are four things that you must attend to—four habits that you must acquire. The first is a proper diet; the second, daily exercise and fresh air; the third, drinking water between meals, and the fourth, daily attention to this matter.

The following hints will be sufficient to guide you:

1. Diet.—A mixed diet, "Everything that is going," is the right diet for a grown-up person. But strong tea helps to cause constipation. At every meal you should eat one or more of the following articles of diet, giving them the preference, but taking meat at least once a day:

1. Fruit, especially fresh fruits and those containing small seeds, as figs, strawberries, etc., grapes, raisins, apples, pears, peaches, olives, bananas, grape-fruit, etc. Eating an apple before breakfast is a help.

2. Vegetables, especially those containing some indigestible fibre or other residue, as green vegetables, salads, potatoes, tomatoes, parsnips, onions, celery, carrots, turnips, etc.

3. Honey, syrup, treacle, jam, etc., anything containing sugar.

4. Any food containing common salt, neutral salts of vegetable acids, etc., such as herring, sardines, smoked fish, smoked ham or bacon, and food prepared from fruits, as marmalade, etc.

5. Any food containing fat, as butter, salad-dressing, cream, meat with fat, etc.

6. Whole wheat bread, brown bread, graham bread, ginger-bread, digestive biscuits, etc., any bread containing some of the outside husk of the wheat.

7. Any food containing lactic acid, butyric acid, or other organic acids, such as buttermilk, sour milk, koumiss, kephyr, etc.

8. Any food containing a solid residue, as porridge made from oatmeal, cornmeal, cracked wheat, rolled oats, etc., oatcake and corncake.

9. Legs and wings of fowls, fish with skin, etc.

"Skins and bones,
Strings and stones."

10. Beef-tea, broths, soups, etc.

2. Daily Exercise and Fresh Air.

The general health and muscular tone of the body have much to do with the condition of the intestines. Unless the general muscular tone is fairly good, we cannot avoid constipation. The muscles must have a good tone. This applies to all the muscles, even the muscles of respiration. Good breathing exercises help. So you must take some suitable exercises daily, such as walking, riding, golfing, skating, bicycling, swinging clubs, fencing, playing tennis, football, basket-ball, etc., and be out in the open air for at least one hour every day.

3. Drinking Water.—A drink of hot water before breakfast helps much. A glass of water or lemonade, either hot or cold should be taken in the middle of the morning and in the middle of the afternoon. Few people drink enough water.

4. Daily Habits.—A regular daily habit of relieving the bowels at a definite hour by the clock is essential. Time must be secured for this purpose, and the patient must not be hurried. On no account allow this to be omitted. The feet should be supported on a low stool. Sometimes adopting the crouching or squatting posture, instead of the sitting posture, while attempting to relieve the bowels, will cure constipation. You must not strain.

If you are really intelligent, and have perseverance, the formation of this habit is possible, with the gratifying result of a complete and permanent cure of the constipation. The patient should go when the clock strikes, and an excellent plan is to go to the bathroom on arising and see to the relief of the bowels before the daily bath. After breakfast is also a good time. The regularity, of course, is the important thing; the hour is a matter of convenience, though the early morning is the natural time.

If you are "willing to work" to get yourself cured, the first thing is to select the time, then keep to that time every day, until the habit is established and constipation is cured. For example, you take a bath at 7.15 a.m., and are willing to go to the toilet at 7.00. If the bowels do not move at the proper time that day, it is probably better, if possible, to wait till that time the next day.

Many people like the following plan: Stew 1½ ounces of Senna with 1 pint of water, sugar, and prunes enough for the water to cover. When thoroughly cooked, lift out the prunes, put them in a jar, strain the juice, and pour it over the prunes. Eat two or three prunes, with two or three tablespoonfuls of the juice at breakfast, or after each meal, if necessary. The best prunes, which are sold in bottles, should be used.

There are a great many causes of constipation that you learn by experience, but often these are not really recognized until the physician points them out. Thus, severe and unwise exertion may be followed by constipation the next day. Again, while some people need to be persuaded not to eat quite so much, there are probably more, especially among women, who do not eat enough. Tea and toast, with a headache, will give anyone constipation. A lonely lunch is very apt to be the sort of lunch that invites constipation. The muscular coat of the bowel will not and cannot contract down on nothing. Eat enough.

Insufficient sleep is another certain cause of constipation. Go to bed early.

THERE was a smart young girl present, who had pretty blue eyes, fluffy fair hair—and a voice which was an irritation to all who were unfortunate enough to hear her.

"Well," concluded the Young Person, after she had expressed her views on Theda Bara and other wearisome "stars": "I must hurry off to meet up with Gladys Burton, or she'll think I'm a mutt."

"What a dreadful girl!" sighed a sweet-looking matron. "She's rather nice-looking, but it would be a positive affliction to be obliged to listen to such a voice—and such vulgar slang! Where did she get that expression: 'meet up'?"

"Haven't you noticed," asked a Lady in Brown, "that we are overworking such words as 'out' and 'up' to a sad extent? I suppose we have imported these expressions from the United States!"

"Like that horrid word, 'gotten'," said a Scotch lassie.

"I really cannot see why we should imitate the United States papers and speakers in all their inaccuracies," said the Lady in Brown. "We use 'gotten' continually and we say 'link up,' 'connect up,' 'win out' and 'meet up' until it is difficult to recognize the English language. I noticed," added the Lady in Brown, nodding approvingly at the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, "that the Family Physician, writing in the February number, concludes with 'they win.' Now, if she had been a cheap writer of 'journalese,' she would have weakened the whole article by saying 'win out.' I suppose she was brought up to appreciate the English language."

"It's the fault of our newspapers," said the Scotch lassie. "Their writing is very slovenly and then those vulgar 'comics' are enough to spoil the public taste."

A Westerner here arose to ask a question. "Do you know whether Mr. Arthur Stringer has lived in the West of Canada?"

No one seemed to know, and the Westerner continued with fire in her eye: "That man has represented a woman of the West as nothing but a vulgarian in her way of speaking. I mean 'The Prairie Mother,' his latest book. I'll admit that the West is more than a trifle slangy, but I've not heard any woman in the West, either in the cities or on the prairies, talk in that style."

"Perhaps Mr. Stringer is just writing down to the dear public," I suggested. "He is, really, a literary artist, and his poems are a national treasure. I only wish he'd write poetry every year. Then look at his delightful short stories—and there is 'The Silver Poppy,' a novel quite worth remembering."

"I don't care," said the undaunted Westerner. "I'd like to talk to him about that impossible person who is the Prairie Mother. She calls her husband 'Dinky Dunk' (or 'Diddums'), her children are Dinkie, Popsy and Pee Wee, and the husband calls his wife 'Gee Gee.'" The Westerner's tones expressed infinite scorn and we laughed at the "goo-ey" names.

"Oh, there's the book," said the Westerner eagerly, as she caught sight of a bright cover. "Now, just wait until I find a few choice bits."

"Here's one," she continued. "The Prairie Mother is talking about the days when she was having a gay time in New York, and comparing them with her hard work in the West. She prefers the latter existence, but this is what she says: 'Any old maid who wants to pirouette around the Plaza roof with a lounge lizard breathing winy breaths into her false hair was welcome to her choice.' If Mr. Stringer thinks that our prairie mothers talk in that style, he's making a sad mistake. Then here's a worse one. Of course, we've all had the experience of having some silly man try to make love to us when he has no business to—when we're married—and we know how to snub him."

"Just say, 'I'm not that kind of woman,' with a fine frost in your voice—and the insolent creature fades away," said the Lady in Brown.

"Here is what the 'Prairie Mother' says," continued the Westerner: "When the young man tries to make love to her, she turns on him with this sweet warning. 'Then let me tell you something. . . I'm a high-strung hell-cat, I am. I'm a bob-cat and I'm not aching to be pawed by you or any other hare-brained he-mutt'."

"Surely," gasped the Lady in Brown, "that isn't in print."

"It's on page one-hundred-and-seventy-five," said the Westerner. "Do you think I could make that up? What kind of children do you suppose that Prairie Mother would have?"

"She didn't live," I said comfortingly, "and, anyway, she isn't, at all, like anything else Mr. Stringer has done. He's just trying to write down to the movie-going public. You see, people who go to the ordinary 'show' demand that kind of thing."

"Well," insisted the unappeased Westerner. "I wish he'd tell us where the dreadful heroine lived. I don't believe she belonged to Alberta."

"Let's wish her on Idaho or Montana," I suggested unkindly. "If you wish to take the taste of such a heroine out of your mouth, read some of Mr. Stringer's poems—especially those with classical themes. He's one of our very few poets."

"To return to the voice of the dear young thing who left us a few moments ago," said the sweet-looking matron, "What is the matter with the Canadian voice?"

"The public schools," said the Lady in Brown emphatically. "The children are allowed, even encouraged, to use the nose as an organ of speech and anything like correct speaking is laughed at as affectation. Yet, if one word is said, except in extravagant praise of our public schools, we are attacked as 'undemocratic' and 'snobbish.' I am sending my daughter to Miss B—," mentioning a private school of long standing, "because the course is thorough, and the teachers are very particular in the matter of voice culture. The shrill, away-up-in-head voice that so many Canadian women seem to think desirable is discouraged, until the girl is finally brought to realize the charm of a low, sweet voice. The good schools in the United States have the same training. It is only the undisciplined Chicago or Vermont citizen who says 'daown' and 'abaout'."

"And, in the meantime," said the matron, "our Canadian business girls are using the pronunciation, address, (with the first syllable set forth prominently) and are saying, 'exquisite', with the second syllable in evidence, when not even a United States dictionary gives any authority for such usage."

"They must have 'gotten' it from a foreign source," said the Lady in Brown. "Don't," I protested, "'gotten' is the last word in cheap imitation of the yellow newspaper editorials."

"I think," said the Lady in Brown, "that climate has something to do with it. I've noticed that the most pleasing voices in Canada are those one hears in Nova Scotia and British Columbia."

"What's the matter with Edmonton and Calgary?" said the Westerner aggressively.

"Why, the Edmonton voice is very much the same as the Toronto voice—too much in the top of the head. Listen to the clatter at any afternoon tea and you will notice that Toronto voices are shriller than those heard in Halifax or Montreal. Of course, I'm just speaking in a general way," added the Lady in Brown, graciously. "I'm a Torontonian, myself, and I find that I must guard against what Arnold Bennett calls 'The note of friction.' You will hear some delightful voices in Toronto, but, if you notice the public speaking at women's meetings, you will find it rather shrill. I was at a large meeting the other day when half-a-dozen women addressed the gathering. Only two of them had pleasing voices—one of these satisfactory speakers was English by birth, the other came from Washington."

"Oh, of course, the Southerners have the sweetest voices of all," admitted the Westerner. "you won't hear anything on the continent more musical than the voice of the girl from New Orleans. But, as you say, it may be a matter of climate, and, when the winds blow and the sun has an extra brightness, the voice of the latest inhabitant has a tendency to rise. Yes, I'll admit that the Canadian voice has a great deal to learn."

As Far As To Bethany

By MARGHA

[F there was one time of the year that Uncle Abel liked more than another it was Easter. To be sure he liked all seasons and all weathers, for he said each had its work in place.

He never sulked when it rained for three days, nor raged when a blizzard swept over the land. He never scolded at the cold of winter or the heat of summer, but bore or enjoyed all seasons.

The years of his life had been many. No one knew how old he was, but middle-aged men and women had always called him Uncle.

His real name was Abel Quilliams. He had come to Canada shortly after the close of England's war with France. He had been a sailor. "Not," he said, "a reg'lar but a 'pressed' man to serve whiles we fought Boney."

How the young ones liked to hear him tell of the day when Napoleon stood at the bow of the battleship that was to bear him away to captivity and St. Helena—stood so that all the British tars could see him.

"What did he look like, Uncle Abel?" asked a boy at one of his recitals. "How did he act?"

"We couldn't see his face right, for his 'ead was bent low—he never looked up—an' 'is arms were folded across 'is chest. We expected to see a giant, but he wor a little 'un."

"What did you do—you sailor-fellows when—when you saw him?" I cried.

"We give 'im three rousin' British cheers—fur he wor a brave soldier wor Boney—an' we wor mighty 'fraid o' him I tell ye. The bishops and clergy wor prayin' agin him in all the pulpits and churches o' the land—an' if it worn't fur God A'mighty—that called up His wind and scattered the Spanish Armady—if it worn't fur He—Boney'd a 'ad us sure. Some said it was Blucher wot come in the nick 'o time, but I allus said it wor God A'mighty."

For over thirty years Uncle Abel had been the village wood-cutter and there were few houses, great or small that he had not furnished with wood sawed and split to suit the different stoves of the house. When the furnace began to supplant the stove his worldly prospects grew dim. He was too old and lame to learn a new trade, so those who had employed him as a wood-cutter, kept him on as a furnace-feeder. For the last few years, however, this had been too heavy for him and he at last consented to retire on the interest of his bank account, which, though not large, was enough for his simple needs.

He had never married. When teased he would say that no one would want such a gnarled stick as he—but the villagers knew that in his prime he was comely, with a fresh honest face which was a passport to the hearts of all who came near him. Old age, instead of making him crabbed and ugly, had softened him. He had few wrinkles and his face grew brighter as he grew older.

The matrons kept him supplied with warm socks and underwear while the maidens knitted him mufflers and mittens.

But it was evident, as it drew near the Eastertide of 187—that Uncle Abel would not live long. He had taken a cold and his strength had not returned, so the neighbors knew that it was only a matter of days before the bright eyes would be closed and the cheery voice would be forever still.

"I don't know how it is that everyone is so kind to me," he said. "I hain't never done nothing for nobody."

"Yes," said the Rector's wife, "you have been smiling on us all our lives, Uncle Abel. No one ever heard you speak an unkind word. You have been helping us all the time."

His eyes grew softer. "I wish," he said, "that I may go on Easter Day—in the morning. I'd like as soon as my body is dead fur the hull world to know that it's goin' to rise again. There was a bit of a girl in the Old Land, an' we promised each other—but she sickened and died. She said she'd wait fur me at the Gate—an' she'll not ha' long now. I—tried—to—marry—but I couldn't forget. She's allus been by me—when I wor sawin' and splittin', when I wor in a crowd, I could allus feel her nearer than any other."

"Perhaps that is why you were always so happy," said the Rector's wife, as she smoothed his pillow and gave him a drink.

"Mayhap," he whispered. "I wor never alone because she wor with me."

Easter morning came and the sun's rays were creeping over the hills, the robins were singing in the trees and the sexton was making ready to ring the bells, when Uncle Abel woke from a heavy sleep, his face shining, the old eager, expectant look in his eyes.

"I'm ready, Marg't," he said. "I've waited, an' it don't seem as if you'd been away—only now I see ye—an'. Marg't, there'll never be a veil atween us any more."

He sighed, his head fell back on the pillow and the Easter bells began to chime—

"Christ the Lord is risen to-day.
Halleluia, Amen."

Out Of the North

In spite of the militant bull-dog in the picture with his feet firmly implanted on the flag, it is not true to say, "What we have we hold." The reason for this must be left to politicians and pamphleteers. There are probably many reasons.

Just now, a colonization association composed of prominent Western gentlemen are raising two million dollars in an effort to people these solitary places. We hope the Canadian Committee of Mental Hygiene, and other Canadian Health Associations will keep a lookout on the type of persons brought in, for the "melting pot" is not nearly as satisfactory as we had hoped.

Yes! while we need population quite badly, we have some misgivings about this colonizing association, and may as well tell the reason here. It is entirely composed of male persons, whereas the immigrants will be composed of both males and females.

It has ever been the practice when the European family-trees have been shaken and the culls shipped out to Canada, the males responsible for the shaking and shipping, being alarmed by the habits of the culls, have called upon the women of this country to put these through some kind of a process or of a sweet suasion known as civilizing, proselytizing, or Canadianizing. Temperance Unions, Missionary Societies, Women's Institutes, Daughters of the Empire, United Farm Women, Young Women's Christian Associations, and a dozen kindred organizations all composed of women, are hard at work—and all the time—trying to classify or clear up just such hopeless hordes from other countries.

It is high time we took a full bite out of these one-sided immigration societies. To speak guardedly, and with a delicate refinement, there should be the very dickens to pay. There won't be however, because we women love to make martyrs of ourselves, and no work is too onerous, or even too useless for us to undertake.

Sometimes I think the female of the species is too religious—if such a thing could be—and that this tends to destroy her sense of humor. At any rate, the joke is on the women folk—a tragic one to be sure—and we do not know it.

Having passed the southern part of Alberta, we find ourselves across the

A Great Recipe from "The Green Gabled Farm"

ONE often learns of most unusual recipes in the most out-of-the-way places. Recently I lunched at a little green gabled farm house in an apple orchard, where I enjoyed a most unusual apple dessert in which I recognized Knox Sparkling Gelatine. Of course, woman-like, I asked for the recipe, which is Knox Apple Charlotte, and give it herewith, together with a recipe for a Rice Mold which was sent in from the South.

APPLE CHARLOTTE

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/4 cup cold water 1 cup boiling water
1 cup sugar 2 tablespoons
1 cup cooked apple pulp 1 lemon juice
Whites of 3 eggs Lady fingers or stale cake
Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar, and when dissolved, add lemon juice. Strain; cool slightly and add apple juice and pulp. When mixture begins to stiffen, beat (using a wire whisk) until light; then add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff, and beat thoroughly. Turn into mold lined with lady fingers, or stale cake. One pint whipped cream may be used in place of whites of eggs.

One package of Knox Gelatine will serve a family of six with four different desserts or salads for four different luncheons or dinners, or make in all twenty-four individual servings.

RICE MOULD WITH PINEAPPLE

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/4 cup cold water Few grains salt
1/2 cup scalded pineapple juice
1/2 cup sugar
1 cup cooked rice 1 cup whipped cream
1 tablespoonful lemon juice
Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes, and dissolve by standing cup in hot water. Add pineapple juice, sugar and salt to rice. Strain into this the gelatine, and mix thoroughly, cool slightly, and add whipped cream and lemon juice. Turn into mold lined with slices of canned pineapple. Chill, and serve with or without whipped cream. Other fruits may be used in place of pineapple and two egg whites used in place of the whipped cream, if desired.

You do not need special molds for Knox Gelatine Desserts or Salads. Any bowl or dish, family size or individual—a deep gravy bowl or fruit dish, custard cups or sundae glasses—may be used. A brick shaped bread pan, round cake tin or pudding dish also make good jelly molds.

Two On the Trail

on a par with Garth's Cree, communication was difficult. In his simplicity, the young man was continually forgetting they could not understand his language; and when Garth shook his head, only shouted the louder.

"You know Herbert Maby?" Garth asked.

Gene vigorously nodded his head, adding a stream of information, which, had they only understood, would have materially altered their subsequent line of action.

Garth shook his head hopelessly. "Where is he?" he asked.

Gene pointed north. "Clearwater Lake," he said; and in the twinkling of an eye, counted seventy-five with his ten fingers.

"Where is the trail?" Garth asked.

Gene shrugged. "Nomoya!" he said.

"No trail!"

Garth had an inspiration. "Can you take us there?" he asked.

Considerable patience and good-humor were called for from both sides, in the arduous course of arriving at an understanding; but finally a bargain was struck. Gene, in addition to the credentials of his person, bore a highly satisfactory letter of recommendation from the company trader at the Crossing. Whatever his errand in the first place may have been, he never gave it another thought; and in half an hour blithely turned his horse's head, and took the lead on the trail.

Gene looked at every considerable tree, every little gully, and every rise in the ground with the eye of an old friend. In a mile or so, at a place marked in no way that Garth could see, he abruptly turned out of the trail; and led them with an air of certainty through the apparently trackless woods. The trees ended at the steep rise that marked the bottom of the northern bank; and thereafter they climbed the grass.

By a devious route known to himself Gene led them through many little grassy ravines, and over ridges, gradually upward. There was no sense or order in the arrangement of the knolls and terraces and spurs of turf—the ground seemed to be pushed up anyhow, like bubbles on the surface of yeast dough. For a while they would be swallowed in a cup-like hollow; then, surmounting a ridge, they would have a brief glimpse of the distant river behind. It was only when they reached the top that, looking back over the turbulent rounded masses of earth, they were able to comprehend the great height to which they had climbed.

Reaching level ground, Gene with a shout set off at a lope in a bee line across the prairie; and Garth bringing up the packhorses in the rear, caused the sedate Emmy to put her best foot foremost. Meanwhile, with pocket-compass and memorandum book, he made notes of the route they took; and when opportunity offered tied a strip of white cotton to a bush. It was his intention to dismiss Gene before coming to Maby's hut; and he wished to be sure of the way back. The guide, comprehending what he was doing, gave him to understand that Emmy could bring them back over their own tracks—unless snow should fall. But Garth was neglecting no precautions.

Garth and Natalie deplored to each other the inadequacy of their means of communication with their guide. The half-breed Gene had a hundred things to point out to them on the prairie, most of which they could only guess at. For one thing, he made them understand he was following in the tracks of two cayuses that had come that way three days before. One was lame, he said, and the other dressed a travoise. All this he learned from certain marks in the grass, which the other two could not see at all. In all ways Gene proved himself a very pearl among guides. Garth, merely from watching him, learned as much trail-craft these two days as he had picked up during the weeks preceding, and Natalie confessed that his cooking put her utterly to shame.

Such was the energy of their pace that they reached the late waterhole before coming to Clearwater Lake early next afternoon. Here Garth decided to camp; for he had determined with Natalie to time their arrival at Maby's hut for the morning; so that after the briefest stay, they could immediately start back. Clearwater Lake was only three miles distant; and Gene was able to point out a popular bluff marking the rise behind which it lay.

Neither Garth nor Natalie obtained much sleep that night; only Gene, wrapped in his rabbit-skin robe beyond the fire, slept the sleep of the savage or the child. They were all astir at dawn; and after eating, they parted; Gene careering south without a care on his mind; while Garth and Natalie turned their apprehensive faces toward the lake. What they were to find there they did not know; but intuition warned them it would be sufficiently painful.

When they reached the brow of the last hill, and the lake stretched vividly below them, they had no eyes for the loveliness of the prospect. The little hut at the head of the water far to the left was the first thing they saw; and it was charged with a significance that obliterated everything else. Facing the early sunlight it stood revealed with startling distinctness; and even at the distance had a ghastly look; gray, artificial and decayed in the midst of the mellow autumn loveliness.

"I will picket the packhorses down at the edge of the water," Garth said; "and we'll ride on without them. It will provide us with an obvious excuse to return immediately."

Natalie scarcely heard. Her eyes were fixed on the distant shack. "What do you suppose it hides from us?" she whispered. "Death, misery, or disgrace?"

Garth could scarcely forbear groaning in the pain of his solicitude for her. "Oh, Natalie!" he said hoarsely, "I haven't done right to expose you to this!"

"I made you!" she said quickly. "Besides, it's not a question of right or wrong. As you said we would, we have only done the best we could, under the circumstances that arose."

"At least let me ride on ahead a little," he begged. "You stay with the outfit. I will hurry back."

She shook her head. "I couldn't stand the suspense," she said simply. "Do not be afraid on my account," she added; "merely looking with my outward eyes at something that always faces me within won't hurt me. Come on!"

But presently she reined up her pony again, and turning a pair of brimming eyes on him, extended her hand. "Garth!" she murmured, "I—I would like to thank you—but I can't!"

"Oh, don't!" he begged. "Whatever we find down there," she said wistfully, "it can't make any difference, can it? We will still be the same partners of the trail?"

Garth went pale to his lips—but he contrived to smile at her. He took her hand and looked at her full. "Until death," he said quietly.

She drew her hand away, with a deep breath. "Come on," she said. "We've got to face it!"

CHAPTER XV.

THE MEETING.

THE spot of the lake shore where Garth picketed the two horses was something under two miles from Maby's hut. The way led among the trees which filled this part of the valley of the lake; and underfoot they could distinguish traces of an old trail. The growth ended abruptly at the edge of a small, dry watercourse, which came down to the lake; and issuing into the open here, the riders beheld the dreaded goal of their long journey immediately before them.

As they crossed the stones, they were ready to fancy they could hear, each the beating of the other's heart; and the scene before them was bitten into their brains, to endure hideously vivid and minute, while life endured. The shack presented a three-quarter view, front and side. It topped a gentle, uneven acclivity of grass, rising from the watercourse at its side; while in front, the ground extended level a hundred feet to the edge of a cut-bank. This bank rose out of the lake sheer and loamy, to the height of a cottage roof; and over the edge hung a tangled fringe of grass-roots. Desolation was the cry of it all; winters upon winters had bleached the logs of the shack silvery like old hair, the chimney had fallen; and all four quarters of glass in the single window were out. At one time the slope between the hut and the bed of the stream had evidently been a theatre of industry; for the ground was pitted and hummocked and rutted; but long ago the grass had indifferently muffled it over, like graves in an old cemetery. In the centre of this waste stood, the picture of dejection, an Indian-bred cayuse, miserable burlesque of the equine species, no bigger than a donkey, and incredibly hairy and misshapen. His back was galed; and one leg, which he painfully favored, puffed to treble its size at the hock. Even the great cottonwood trees springing beyond the hut, with their shattered branches, and blotched and greenish trunks, breathed decay. An ancient dug-out, lying at the mouth of the watercourse, was, like everything else, rotting and seamed.

Two On the Trail

And on the bench at the door of the hut sat the evil genius of the scene; a man with his legs sprawling in front of him, and his head fallen over and back against the wall. He made no move at their approach; and when they came close, they saw that he slept. Pitilessly revealed in the strong sunlight, he made a spectacle at which the most indifferent stranger would have shuddered and sickened—and it was reserved for the woman who had exalted him in her maiden's heart, to see him then. His mouth hung open; he breathed stertorously; and the flies, buzzing in and out of the open door beside him, crawled at will over his ashen face. That his chin was freshly shaven, and his hair brushed, added to the ghastliness. The whole picture was horribly vivid; the littlest details of it struck on the retinas of the two observers like blows—the oblong patch of sunlight cleaving the gloom of the shack inside the door; six muskrat pelts above the man's head, tacked to the logs to dry; an old foul pipe with a silver mounting, half fallen from his relaxed fingers and spilling ashes on the bench; his old-fashioned rifle leaning against the door-frame. Garth could have furnished the size, the style and the make of that gun.

Natalie turned a stony face to Garth. "It is he," she whispered.

Garth thought of an old photograph she had shown him of a dark-haired youth sitting on a horse, with a charming, imperious grace of body and feature, in which there was something godlike and unanswerable; and looking at this wreck of a man, toothless, bald and livid, he was struck with awe.

"You have seen," he whispered to Natalie. "Let us ride back."

She shook her head. "I must say what I came for," she said.

In a moment she had commanded herself again. "Please speak to him," she said.

"Mabyn!" called Garth peremptorily.

The man's lids parted. Natalie was directly in front of him. As his sleep-stupefied eyes slowly took her in, he raised himself to an upright position, and struck his eyeballs sharply with his knuckles.

Garth instinctively drew away a little.

"A white woman!" muttered the man, lost in amazement.

Natalie, her head slightly averted, sat her horse like a carved woman.

Fear grew apace with wonder in Mabyn's eyes; his breath quickened;

he ceaselessly passed his hand in front of his face. "Natalie!" he muttered, still in the toneless voice of one who sleeps. "Oh, my God! It's Natalie!"

Grasping the edge of the bench, he pulled himself to his feet; and took a few uncertain steps toward her. He put out his hand fearfully.

Natalie sharply reined back her horse. "Don't touch me!" she said.

It broke the spell that held him—but not wholly. His hands dropped to his sides; a saner light appeared in his eyes; and he looked all around, as if to convince himself of the realness of his surroundings. On Garth his eyes lingered stupidly for a moment; then impatiently returned to Natalie.

"If it's you, how did you get here?" he asked quietly enough—still bemused.

"I came over the prairie, as every one comes," she said sharply.

Mabyn frowned. "I'm wide awake," he said irritably. "I know where I am. I fell asleep on the bench half an hour ago—but," his voice deepened and swelled on the note of awe, "you, Natalie! You or your wraith! I—I can't take it in!" The faded eyes bolted, and swept wearily and unseeing over the lake.

Natalie winced every time he spoke her name. "Try to collect yourself," she said coldly. "There is no doubt of its being I."

"The voice too!" he muttered, struck with the new thought. His eyes returned to her. "Natalie—and not changed at all!" he murmured dreamily. "But more beautiful!"

He still stood looking at her with something of the air of a bewildered child, but more of the aged lunatic. "The first time I saw her, she was on a horse," he said in his dull voice. "But she was better dressed. Where did you get those clothes?" he asked suddenly.

Natalie shot an appealing glance at Garth.

He, in his over-mastering disgust of the man, could not put away the thought that there was something feigned in this excessive bewilderment. "Come to yourself, Mabyn!" he said sharply. "We can't stop here!"

Mabyn darted a startled, spiteful glance at the new speaker, and without another word, turned and went back to the bench, where he sat, burying his face in his hands.

Natalie thought she might venture to address him again. "I have something important to tell you," she began.

Mabyn darted a queer, furtive look at her; shame, suspicion, obsequiousness and a sudden, reborn passion all had a part in it. "Won't you shake hands with me?" he asked suddenly.

Natalie drew the long breath that invokes Patience and looked elsewhere.

"Never mind that now," said she. "Please listen to what I have to say."

"N-never mind," he gabbled hurriedly. "Don't come in! It's not fit to receive you! It's better out here!" Little beads of sweat were springing out on his forehead.

His whole bearing had been so wild and stupefied since his waking, that they attached small importance to this display of terror. Natalie patiently essayed to speak again; but again he interrupted.

His face cleared. "You've left your outfit somewhere back on the trail," he said eagerly. "I'll go back with you; and we can talk things over quietly there!" He actually started toward the watercourse, walking with jerky, uneven steps.

Natalie made no move to follow. "I will say what I have to say here," she spoke after him.

"You have not written to your mother or to me in many months," began Natalie coldly; "and your letters for three years past have given us no information. Your mother's whole thought is of you; and through her anxiety and suspense she is worn to a shadow of what she was; the doctors tell her she has a mortal disease that must soon prevail."

What Else

Do children welcome like these Bubble Grains?

Puffed Grains are the finest cereals children ever get. And the cereals that you want them to like best.

Then why not keep both on hand—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice? Get all the delights they offer.

Puffed Wheat supplies whole wheat.

Puffed Rice supplies whole rice.

Why we explode them

The grains are steam exploded, shot from guns. They come to you as bubble grains, light, airy, crisp. That, of course, is what makes them enticing. But the purpose is to blast the granules and fit them to digest.

A hundred million food cells lie in every kernel. We explode them all. Then all the many elements can be assimilated. Prof. A. P. Anderson, the food expert, was inventor of this process.

Cooking breaks some food cells, toasting will break more. But puffing alone breaks them all.

For breakfast

The supreme dainty is Puffed Rice. Serve with cream and sugar, with melted butter, or mix in your fruit.

For supper

Puffed Wheat in milk supplies a practically complete food. It is easy to digest. And you never serve a milk dish more inviting.

These airy grains, puffed to eight times size, seem like food confections. They taste like tidbits, made only to delight. But they mean grain foods so prepared that every atom feeds.

Millions of mothers who know these facts serve them morning, noon and night.

Puffed Wheat

Puffed Rice

Whole grains puffed to 8 times normal size

For supper, float Puffed Wheat in milk. These are whole-wheat bubbles toasted. They are four times as porous as bread.

Children need whole wheat. They need the minerals in the outer coats. Served in this way they will revel in it.

Out Of the North

border in the Province of Saskatchewan, and still travelling east and south.
Here we have left the trees behind us and are fairly out on the wide prairies
—a land level as paper, with no place where one could hide except on a roof behind a chimney.

When a man makes a bed on these plains, he tries to make it in a buffalo
"wallow." It seems like a stopping place, he says.

Many folk who have never seen the prairies think of them only as grasslands where wild men ride after wilder cows, with a sprinkling of Mounted Police and red men thrown in the picture to give it color and dash.

This is not entirely wrong, for the prairie is many things, as must be allowed in a land that has a stretch of over a thousand miles.

Besides, this idea of the prairie is not an unworthy one for, in this summary, there has been included the three finest classes of free riders in all the world—that is to say, the Indians, the cowmen, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

And sure they're bonny boys too, and if you are the right sort yourself, you might ride a horse also, and get to like them pretty well.

OTHERS think of it as an untilled, trackless, plain, dreary as eternity, where distance stretches into distance till lost in some void of the infinite sky.

Yes, this is true also. Nowhere on the earth is there such silence and inscrutability as in the large lands of the North, but notwithstanding this, there are hundreds of things to see.
Thomas Carlyle knew this when he set it down that "Even a Russian steppe has tumuli and gold ornaments."

Some there are soft-nurtured folk and urban bred—who think of the prairies as snow-clad for many months in the year.

Yes, there is snow on the plains—snow of a very cold kind—but how else are we to have hardy men and hardy wheat? Besides, snow is not an evil in itself. The wise man of Uz asked this of his generation, "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?"

A great and gentle prelate, one Bompas, who lived for half a century in the wonder-house of the North, answered it for us, and showed how the snow was color, covering, and beauty. Yes, and to him, it was an adventure, for he writes, "A first walk on the Arctic Ocean is not unaccompanied by a strange sensation, a sort of feeling of having caught a lion asleep."

And having said this, I wish to contradict myself and say the prairie folk may be subject to obsessions also, in that one, with eyes unopposed, may dream and drift on these plains as in no other place in the world, except upon the sea. They have told me this themselves but their story has been so unknit and unjoined I cannot set it down.

On the whole, the people who live on the prairies are happy. Perhaps, it is because they are mostly young and are making homes. For this reason, and in the face of all opposition, we will contend till our pens wear out, that the happiest existence in the whole world is to live out-of-door with the person you love.

One of my companions who is a writer has also been thinking on this splendid land of Saskatchewan and ventures the opinion that, hereabout, all the cups are full. It was only natural that she should be contradicted by the second writer in my party who says, "Except the tippler's cup."

It is very hard in the North-West Provinces for people to forget that liquor is under a ban. It is not that they suffer to any extent from the drinking of water, but merely because intoxicants are prohibited.

Lame Dog, an old Cree I have known these many years, when he came to town recently, brought me a cup made from birch-bark, and warned me not to dip it in the sloughs by any trail lest I be overcome by the death-sickness. When white people drink from sloughs they become whiter and cannot eat for their stomach-pot turns upside down. "Tah!" says the Cree, if it were not for those mad-hearted people who scrape their necks smooth every day, all people would have brandy instead of water. It is a bad goodness for men not to drink brandy."

And that I might the better agree with him, Lame Dog presented me also with a foxtail "feather" that was white at the tip. It is his hidden desire that Manitou, the high-hearted one who sees all things, will let his eye to rest upon me steadily and preserve me from the evil ghosts of dead men.

WINNIPEG, the Capital of Manitoba is the centre of the continent of North America—that is to say, there is as much land north of Winnipeg as there is to the south of it. In view of this, the misguided person on the Gulf of Mexico who sneers at Winnipeg as being situated at the top of the earth, had therefore, better apply a ruler to the map and see what a colossal mistake he is making. It ought then to become evident to him that, in time to come, this northern country, greater in area than the United States with our Eastern provinces thrown in, will in time, come to be the heart of Canada and that Edmonton on the Saskatchewan still north eight hundred miles, may be its great metropolis. We say this because no city in Canada has such enormous resources at its door unless it be Vancouver.

No! No! we are not decrying the Eastern cities; we are asking you to put the ruler to the map of America —not Canada alone, mind you—and open your minds to the idea.

Indeed, we merely draw attention to the fact that statesmen and financiers, having this in mind, may by the scale of a hemisphere, shape their designs.
When so "Great truly is the Actual" one hesitates to speak of visions or foresight but, nevertheless, it is true that few of us have properly spied out this Promised Land of Canada, or measured aright its fruit, its milk and its honey.

At Winnipeg, we leave "the flyer" of the Canadian National Railway which has carried us from Edmonton in twenty-seven hours, the shortest scheduled time that has yet been given to the travelling public. What heretofore we have called "the illimitable prairie" seems limited after all.

In our city when it was Fort Edmonton, there were three sisters who used to travel this trail by ox-cart, and on down to St. Paul in the state of Minnesota in order that they might catch the train for Hamilton, Ontario, where they attended boarding-school.
If they kept steadily to the trail, they could catch the train in three months' time.

In answer to your question, I reply that the three sisters are with us yet, and still attending the gayest of our festivities. Each of them, at the age of sixteen, married a Factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and played notable parts in the life of the country. One married Factor Woods who had charge of the Post at Athabasca Landing; the second wedded Factor
Young of Grouard on the Lesser Slave Lake, and the third, Factor
Hardisty of Edmonton.

Mrs. Woods had no family; Mrs.
Young had several sons who fought in the late European war, and a daughter who is married to Dr. Roy, the Canadian Commissioner in France.
Mrs. Hardisty also sent two sons to the war. The lofty peak in the Yellow Head Pass known as Mount Hardisty, was so named in honor of her husband, who, by-the-way was a brother-in-law of the late Lord Strathcona.

One might linger and talk about these old families of the North, who ought to be much better known in Canada, but it is time we caught our train which pulls out short on the twelve-hundred-mile stretch to Toronto, which is down by the Sea of Ontario.

Editorial—April and After

THE most variable month of the year—April—with her smiles in the morning and her tears before night—is on her way, and already the hillsides are showing promise of Spring. In the magazine world, too, a fresh breeze is blowing, and new fashions have come with the mid-month of the season. We hope you like the shorter gown which this publication has seen fit to assume for its April issue. In fact, this journal is strictly in the fashion, as the readers will admit, after scanning the other magazines. The war is over, but the short skirts persist, for there is a scarcity of cloth and silk, which encourages brevity in the matter of skirts and coats. The supply of paper is limited, also, and so the magazines are donning abbreviated skirts and finding themselves better able to move about—thus the circulation is stimulated. You will find the new-sized magazine easier to hold than the other, and altogether a more convenient companion for the fireside or the library table.

There will naturally be more pages in the new-fashioned 1921 magazine than in the old, and we trust that our readers will find the usual departments in their familiar places. Last month we were obliged to "hold over" a page of "Nut Novelties," which, however, gladdens your eyes in this April issue. Mary M. Neil's cookery articles continue to be one of our most valuable features, and we know that you will welcome this month's pages of refreshing recipes.

NOW that we have announced that this is a reconstruction month, we are willing to admit that cutting down the size of the page is almost as bad as moving. The most perplexing feature in this undertaking of running an inch-and-a-half tuck in our page was the treatment of the fashions. Now, censors may say what they please concerning woman's vanity and consuming interest in clothes, but "wherewithal shall ye be clothed" remains a highly important consideration for the women of the household. Consequently, we were concerned lest the readjustment of our Pictorial Review patterns should prove not just what our fancy painted. However, the new arrangement of the illustrations for our fashion pages is all that we could desire, and you may look each month for as good service as you have received from this excellent department in the past. We have been endeavoring to give a page of embroidery in each month's issue, and we should be glad to have the opinion of our readers as to their need for such patterns. While needlework is not so popular with the modern maiden as it was with our grandmothers, still the art of embroidery is not likely to go out of fashion, and it is "the little touch" which makes the dainty difference in towel, apron or gown.

FICTION is a feature in our monthly fare which you cannot afford to ignore. For this month we are fortunate in having a story by Anna McClure Sholl, one of the best-known writers on the continent. "The Square of Chinese Embroidery" has just enough of the mystery element to make you wonder how a stray jewel is going to come back. Then there is "The Most Kindest Cut," by William Hugo Pabke, which is an amusing story of private theatricals, showing how an untoward incident may prove a benefit. There is also an unusual story, "The Bad Penny," by Margaret Hilda Wise, a young writer whose work is of unusual merit and who delights in a good "dog story."

FOR the May issue we have stories that will prove to you that we are trying to give our readers the best that Canadian writers are producing. There is no more popular author than Mrs. Ewan Macdonald, better known as L. M. Montgomery, who has given us "Anne of Green Gables" and other delightful stories of Prince Edward Island. Our next issue will contain "Bloom of May," a story by this writer, for which Mr. Bladen is making the illustrations. "The House of Shadows," by Virna Sheard, is an exquisite fantasy of May-time, and "To Him That Hath," by Sara Galbraith Mosher, is a tale which you will not only read, but will ask others to read.

The four walls of the room received due consideration in our March issue; in this number Miss Coxwell treats of new hangings and draperies for the house which needs refurbishing, and in May will contribute an article regarding the summer home. Our garden articles are quite worth while, and this month Mr. Cutting has turned his attention to the flowers and has given highly valuable information regarding the times and seasons for planting.

Giving the Child a Chance

By LILIAN D. MILNER

A LITTLE while ago, the mother of one of my small friends paid me a visit, and registered an indignant protest against the action of a school nurse, who had sent her child home because a swab taken from the little girl's throat had shown the germs of diphtheria.

The child, the mother argued, had not diphtheria. She was quite well. The mother had come to me, because the nurse was a friend of mine, to ask if I would use my influence in gaining permission for her little daughter to return to school. As I am not a doctor of medicine, nor a trained nurse, I felt I could not assume any responsibility in the matter. I was not very much surprised to receive a message a few weeks later that the girl had died from diphtheria. The nurse's diagnosis was, evidently, correct.

The incident reminded me of an experience of my own in regard to medical inspection in schools, which I feel I should relate in the hope of inducing parents to co-operate with the doctors and nurses who are devoting their time and energy to this splendid work.

I spent my early years in England, and went to school for the first time on my fifth birthday. It was not very long after that we had a visit one day from a man, who I thought, must be an inspector. An inspector was a kind of giant ogre, an all-powerful being, who had to be propitiated at any price. I had heard all about them, and the terrible things they could do, such as expelling one from school, from some of the older pupils. The inspector (I was to learn later that he was an oculist), took the pupils, one by one, into a vacant class-room, and it was with a feeling of apprehension, not unmixed with relief, that my waiting-time was over, and I went into the room in my turn.

On the blackboard was a white card with black letters arranged in the form of a pyramid, a large letter at the apex, and a row of much smaller ones forming the base. I did not anticipate any difficulty in impressing the inspector with my learning, for I could gabble off the alphabet beautifully, but when he sent me to the back of the room, and, covering up one of my eyes, told me to tell him the letters, I realized all I had heard about inspectors being horrid, mean people was true.

I told him the first letter and two on the next line glibly, but I had difficulty in making out the letters on the third line, and I couldn't tell the ones in the next line at all. The inspector covered up the other eye and told me to begin all over again. I couldn't manage even the third line this time.

"Come, come, little girl," the man said impatiently; "can't you tell me what this letter is?"

I shook my head; then I guessed—wrongly!

It was the man's turn to shake his head. He moved the pointer to the next letter, and again I guessed—wrongly!

The inspector (?) said that would do, and I gulped down a sob. I wanted to tell him I could tell all the letters if he would let me stand up close to the board, and that I could tell them without any card even! The lump in my throat prevented me from imparting this information, and I passed out of the room, choking back another sob.

A LITTLE while after the teacher called me up to her desk. Usually she smiled at me when she asked me to do things, for we were great friends, and I often walked part of the way home with her, but this day her face was very grave as she handed me a note, telling me to be sure and give it to my mother. I knew what that that he had said I was to wear glasses, but that she would not let me have them. I gathered, somehow, that the man at school had not been an inspector, but a doctor, another necessary evil. One of the species had worried me considerably some time before by requesting that I put out my tongue at him, a thing my mother had said I must never do! When he insisted I complied with his request—not in the orthodox manner, apparently—for he said nice little girls didn't do it that way!

I didn't get the glasses, and, later, the headmistress wouldn't let me learn to sew, evidently trying to save me from straining my eyes. Once a year a doctor came to school and I carried a note home to my mother. Each time I was taken to a specialist, but I never got the glasses the various ones prescribed. Then I left school and, after a while, there was no one to worry about my eyes.

One day, some years later, when I was working as a stenographer, I got a speck of dust in my right eye and closed it for a moment. Then I received a shock, for I found I couldn't see across the room with my left eye. I couldn't see anything but a grey darkness. I was studying at the time for an examination, and doing a lot of reading, but I felt that so long as my right eye was all right there was no occasion for worry.

It was a short time after this that the pages of the books I read began to blur after I was reading them a little while, and the dreadful suspicion entered my mind that I was going blind! I did not go to a doctor, for I didn't want to have that suspicion confirmed. If I was going blind—well, I'd go blind; that was all.

I kept my trouble to myself, but one day, when I was staying with a friend, I dropped a small coin on the floor. She remarked, laughing, as I picked it up, that I had looked for it with the tips of my fingers, but her face grew very grave when I explained that it was easier for me to find things that way! She had had trouble with her own eyes, and knew enough to guess what that abnormal sense of touch meant.

She made an appointment for me with her own eye specialist, and I kept it the next morning. He was a very busy man, and appointments had usually to be made about two weeks in advance, but my friend had evidently impressed him with the urgent need for attention in my case. At nine o'clock I entered his consulting room; at twelve o'clock the doctor was still working on my eyes, and had broken engagements with people who had come some distance by train. He was interested—not in me, but my eyes! I think he forgot the eyes were attached to a human being, for I was so tired by the time he got through with me that I almost collapsed.

He prescribed three months' rest, at the end of which time I was to see him again. I was to do no reading whatever, and no writing—not even letters. If I didn't follow his prescription—he ended the sentence with an ominous shrug of his shoulders.

THREE months later, I visited him again and, in addition to the previous tests, he tried a new one. When he asked me what I saw and I told him, he protested, first gently, finally heatedly, that I could not possibly see what I said. I protested

A CANADIAN IN ROUMANIA

Madame Pantazzi, who has done so much for the cause of Roumania, is a Canadian by birth, and is the eldest daughter of Mr. T. B. Greening, of Toronto, formerly of Hamilton. Madame Pantazzi, as a girl, travelled extensively in Europe, and in March, 1919, was married to Commander Basile Pantazzi, Royal Roumanian Navy, at the British Embassy, Paris. For seven years Madame Pantazzi resided at Galatz, but in 1916 went to Bucharest, where her residence was bombed. Many adventures fell to her lot during the war, and the public has had an opportunity of hearing Madame Pantazzi tell her graphic story. During the summer the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL will publish several chapters from this writer's forthcoming volume on her adopted country. (Full serial rights secured.)

meant. They didn't want me to come back to school any more. I didn't wait at the gate in order to walk home with the teacher that day!

My mother looked a little annoyed when she read the note, but she didn't tell me I had disgraced her as I had expected. She merely said I would not go to school that afternoon. Until then I had hoped I wasn't really going to be expelled, but then I knew I was.

My mother took me to an eye specialist that day, and I heard her explaining to a friend, later,

WEAR RESISTANCE

The BALANCED VARNISH

WATER RESISTANCE

"61" FLOOR VARNISH is different

THE properties of "61" Floor Varnish are so "balanced" that "61" possesses wear-resistance as well as water-resistance. No ordinary varnish can have both of these qualities to the same degree — and "61" is not an ordinary varnish.

Some varnishes are waterproof but are woefully lacking in the toughness necessary to wear-resistance. Other varnishes, generally satisfactory, quickly turn white and go to pieces under the action of water. "61" has the maximum combined degree of wear-resistance and water-resistance.

Many other technically opposing qualities are balanced in "61," such as luster with spreading, quick drying with durability and brilliancy of color with permanency of color.

The children can romp and play on "61," the young folks dance on it and the servants abuse it by the spilling of liquids or careless washing. "61" is heelproof, marproof and waterproof.

Thus this composite varnish, "61," has become a favorite for furniture, woodwork and general household purposes — because it is so tough, elastic, long-wearing and waterproof on floors.

"61" is made not only in the Clear, but also in beautiful wood-stain colors that stain and varnish in one operation, and flow smoothly off the brush without streaks, laps or brush marks. This is insured by the costly raw materials used, as well as the thorough blending of color and varnish.

Send for color card and panel finished with "61." Try the hammer test on the panel. You may dent the wood but the varnish won't crack.

The Story of a Woven Message Which Solved a Mystery

The Square of Chinese Embroidery

By Anna McClure Sholl

ILLUSTRATED BY G. W. L. BLADEN

Copyright, in United States and Great Britain, by the Shortstory Publishing Company.

THE bland light of the wax candles lent to the many ancient pieces in the room a tone even softer than their own autumnal hues. Into the tapestried effect of the whole were woven gleams of dull gold, a revelation of strange blues, with here and there a note of white lent by the trembling stalks of narcissus in vases of old silver. A wood-fire made pleasant sounds on the low hearth. At a spinet some one sat evoking plaintive tremulous music. The guests sipping their coffee seemed more inclined for reverie than conversation.

The distinguished actress in whose honor the dinner had been given was chatting with her hostess, her slender figure in graceful attitude upon a chaise-longue. The dead white of her gown was relieved only by a string of sapphires whose deep blue hearts evoked the blue of the wearer's eyes, now turned admiringly upon the art-objects about her.

"What pleases you most?" her hostess inquired. "Who could choose among the many beautiful things here!—but I should like to examine more closely the square of embroidery you have framed under glass."

"You shall have it in your hands."

Veronica Ward rose and crossed the room, followed by the eyes of her guests, for whom she expressed the very spirit of the place itself. To some of these it seemed as if romances might be again in preparation for her. When old suitors return from distant lands, society has a right to expect that the curtain will rise on a comedy or a tragedy, as the case may be.

Veronica carried the frame of embroidery to Madame Duval. The others gathered about the chaise-longue to examine the treasure.

"It is a modern piece," the hostess explained, "embroidered, I believe, by a Chinese girl in prison, who wove her own peculiar fancies through these strange blues and greens—fancies I can't quite make out. There appears to be a motive of dragons strangling each other—or else the little bird caught between them—this flash of gold is one of its wings, you see, and it has apparently fallen from the bough of cherry blossoms just suggested in those faint white flowers. The border, as far as I can discover, is made up of conventionalized Chinese characters—conventionalized, indeed, beyond all reading. I have asked several persons supposed to read Chinese to interpret them, but they found them too difficult."

"Have you asked Mr. Millward?" a debutante questioned.

"Mr. Stanton has been in China, too, hasn't he?" some one else inquired.

The men appearing at that moment in the doorway of the drawing-room a general appeal was made to them to unravel the mystery. Frederick Millward, for several years an unofficial sojourner in the shadow of the American Legation at Peking, came languidly forward, looking from under his heavy eyelids at his hostess with the air of a man who expects very soon to become an accepted suitor. The general opinion of her circle that Veronica Ward would never marry again was an added spur to his ambition.

She addressed him.

"Mr. Millward, you should be able to tell us what these characters mean."

He glanced at the square of embroidery, then at Madame Duval, whose well-poised head was still bent over the frame. The flash of the large Embroidered by a Chinese girl in prison, who wove . . . something here, where the letters glow faintly rose and gold. They read: "Love is a mighty god. I serve him gladly."

Madame Duval asked. "The solving of this riddle, remember, may admit one to paradise."

"I can read the ordinary Chinese characters; but these have been twisted for the purpose of ornament—or perhaps concealment—almost beyond recognition," he replied. After a few moments' scrutiny he turned to his hostess.

"Have you a magnifying glass? What I took for a single row of characters will resolve itself, I think, under a glass into three rows."

VERONICA rang and directed the maid who appeared to bring a glass from the library. Stanton looked through intently for some minutes, then his hostess saw him give a little start and change color. But in a moment the ripple of agitation passed from his features, leaving them again calm and non-committal. Suddenly he put the glass on the table and turned away with a short laugh.

"It's beyond my powers to unravel."

"You were my last hope! Now I shall never know whether a blessing or a curse hangs on my walls."

"Only blessings could come to you," some one said, politely platitudinous.

A shadow passed over her face.

"I am a little doubtful that a blessing surrounds that allegory of a bird caught between two dragons. I had hoped that Mr. Stanton would be able to read the riddle."

"I thought you were a great Chinese scholar, Stanton," Millward remarked with mild malice.

"Another case of reputation being greater than achievement," Stanton replied, carelessly.

Veronica, conscious of the note of antagonism struck by the two men, turned to the debutante.

"Aren't you going to sing for us, Gladys?"

At that moment there was a startled exclamation from Madame Duval, who rose suddenly from the chaise-longue.

"My pendant, my sapphire—it is gone!"

Veronica came quickly to her side. Everybody looked at the necklace. The setting which had held the big sapphire dangled empty from the chain. Veronica put out a warning hand.

"Stand just where you are, Madame Duval. It has probably dropped at your feet."

"I saw it only ten minutes ago," Millward remarked, as he knelt to begin the search. "I was noticing its wonderful color."

The others joined him. Every moment some one expected some one else to say, "Here it is," but the circle of searchers widened as it became evident that the sapphire had not fallen at Madame Duval's feet. She was visibly agitated when the gem was not found at once. A sapphire known to two continents was to be considered more seriously than a bangle dropped from a schoolgirl's bracelet.

"Step aside now, please, Madame Duval," Veronica directed, "and let them move the chaise-longue."

Madame Duval crossed to the other side of the room. The chair on which she had been sitting was moved. At last every inch of space within a radius of ten feet of the chaise-longue had been gone over in vain. The peculiar quiet was beginning to fall upon the guests which betokens consciousness of an awkward situation.

Veronica approached Madame Duval.

"You are sure it did not fall into the corsage of your dress?"

"Perfectly sure."

"Nor into the laces of your gown?"

"They could not hold it. It is too heavy."

Stanton had stopped searching and was bending again over the square of embroidery, examining it closely through the glass. Madame Duval glanced towards him with a little rueful smile.

"Mr. Stanton's interest in the Chinese embroidery is greater than his concern over the loss of my sapphire," she remarked. "Mr. Millward does not give up so easily."

Millward, indeed, was still prosecuting the search with vigor, shaking out draperies, looking under chairs where he had already looked a dozen times. At last he, too, stopped and came gravely to Madame Duval.

"I am afraid we are facing but one conclusion," he said in a low voice.

"That conclusion has been in my mind for some moments," she replied. Then turning to Mrs. Ward, she said:

pendent sapphire at her throat held his eyes for a moment, while a light stole into them that even the vision of Veronica Ward had not been able to kindle.

Madame Duval, becoming aware of his gaze upon her, looked up with a challenging smile.

"I think these mysterious letters should be made a test like Portia's caskets."

"The reward is too great to hang upon such a trifle," said a voice in the background.

The speaker was Giles Stanton, a civil engineer, for several years in the service of the Chinese government. A tradition existed that his exile dated from the time that Veronica Chester had become Mrs. Ward, but whether or not she was the magnet that had drawn him home was a question only to be settled by future developments. The sun and wind of strange climates had transformed him into a stranger—an enigma of the East, as some one called him, who had attempted to break through his courteous taciturnity.

Millward took his gaze from the sapphire and turned it somewhat sullenly upon Stanton, measuring his inches, remarking mentally that that sort of weather-beaten, silent, muscular man made, as a rule, a rival of no mean pretensions. Ten years ago he had ignored Stanton, then obscure and unsuccessful, but during those years their paths had crossed more than once in the Orient, each time with a cumulative advantage in Stanton's favor. Millward made up his mind during the dinner of this evening that in the wooing of Mrs. Ward he would act quickly.

"Won't you try to read these characters for us, Mr. Millward?" his hostess said, again appealing to him.

He came to her side and bent over the frame with the appearance of studying the embroidery, but he could make nothing of it at first sight, and he was too indifferent to attempt seriously to decipher it. He prolonged his examination, however, until some one exclaimed:

"I believe he knows and won't tell us!"

"I confess I can't make it out."

"Now Mr. Stanton, your turn!"

Millward made way for his rival. As he did so he dropped his handkerchief and picked it up again with his usual slowness of movement. Then he stood aside to let Stanton pass.

Veronica Ward felt her hands tremble a little as Stanton approached. She laid the frame upon an adjacent table where the light fell on it.

"Are you going to fail, too, Mr. Stanton?"

"What do you know of the parlor maid who brought the new sapphire dress to Mr. Stanton? It seems strange to suppose such a thing, but while we were all asleep, she might easily have slipped and picked up the sapphire unobserved."

Veronica looked grave.

"Hortense has been with me eight years and I know her to be thoroughly trustworthy."

"Oh, Mrs. Ward," Millward said, gently, "we are being pushed, you see, to an inevitable conclusion unless we all come under suspicion," he added with a laugh.

"I think we have no more right to fasten suspicion upon a servant than upon any other person."

Madame Duval nodded assent.

"I quite agree with you, Mrs. Ward. I understand how embarrassing it is to question an old servant upon such a subject, but, frankly, what else remains for us to do? We've looked everywhere. A quarter of an hour ago the sapphire was on my chain. None of us has left the room, but in that quarter of an hour your maid entered and left it."

"She might be unaware of the great value of the stone," Millward remarked; "she might think it a bauble of blue glass dropped from some ornament in the drawing-room."

Veronica smiled.

"Hortense is not stupid, Mr. Millward."

"No; if she found it," Madame Duval said, "she probably knew what it was."

"But it has to be proved that she found it," Veronica added.

The guests were now conversing in little groups from which occasionally some one would detach himself and start again to search. Only Stanton remained apparently impassive and indifferent near the table which held the square of embroidery. Veronica glanced towards him as, consenting at last to Madame Duval's wish that Hortense be questioned, she was preparing to leave the drawing-room. Something in the mute appeal of her look told him that she needed his aid, and he crossed the room to her side. She communicated to him Madame Duval's suspicions of Hortense and her own reluctance to interrogate the girl.

"But something has to be set in motion," she added. "A valuable sapphire cannot have disappeared out of my drawing-room by magic."

He glanced about to be sure that no one was near enough to overhear them.

"Don't go to Hortense. Go into the library and remain there until I come for you. I believe that the sapphire will be found."

The protection in his manner, the desire to serve her written in his face, took a load of care from her shoulders and thrilled her for a moment with a sweet unreasoning happiness. She could not divine what he meant or whom he suspected, or if he suspected any one, but she rested gladly in the knowledge that he was standing between her and an unpleasant situation. She left the room apparently to summon Hortense.

Stanton went to Madame Duval, spoke with her a few moments on the subject of her loss, then, as others came up he made his way to the farther end of the room where Millward was still pursuing a desultory search. As Stanton approached he looked up, changed color, then said lightly:

"What a devil of a nuisance!"

Stanton nodded.

"Most unfortunate! You said once, Millward, at a certain game of cards you may remember was played one afternoon at Pekin, that if you could ever get out of debt you'd go back to the United States. That afternoon—if again your memory does not fail you—you made a desperate effort to get out of debt by cheating at cards."

Millward had turned a dull angry red.

"You lie!"

"You know I do not lie!"

"What are you hovering over me for like a vulture?"

"To make sure of you! I let you go then rather than create a scandal at the legation. But I shall not let you go now. I offer you the choice of giving up the sapphire, or being forced to give it up."

"Forced!"

"Yes, I said 'forced.' You threw the theft of the Marquette ruby on Cherry-blossom, the little servant at the Marquettes who did you the honor of caring for you; and bearing a punishment that should have fallen on your shoulders."

"Cherry-blossom!" Millward echoed, his lips blue.

"You remember her beyond doubt. You abused both her faith and the Marquettes' hospitality. The loss of their ruby, a family heirloom, made a great stir at the time, but it was Cherry-blossom who was sent to prison!"

"What the devil has that to do with —"

"It has everything to do with this present difficulty. I am determined that no other innocent girl shall be called a thief that you may go scot-free."

Millward's eyes had grown round and pale with superstitious fear.

He bent over the frame with the appearance of studying the embroidery, but could make nothing of it.

"Where did you rake up this —"

"I'll not expose you on two conditions," Stanton interrupted. "The first is that you restore the sapphire. Drop it on the floor—shake it from a curtain, or any other trick to cover yourself, then restore it to Madame Duval. The second condition is, that you leave this house the instant you have given up the sapphire—and never enter it again. If you do, I shall tell Mrs. Ward everything."

Millward was livid.

"What proof —" he began.

"You dropped your handkerchief. Stooping to pick it up, I saw by the motion of your fingers that you picked something else up with it. But that would not have been enough without the confirmation I had later."

"Whose?" Millward demanded.

"A woman's. You can never make up to Cherry-blossom what she has suffered for you, but if you can ever earn any money honestly I advise you to donate some of it to her, or to her family, who were partially dependent on her."

MILLWARD gave him a look of impotent hatred, then recovering his sang-froid, strolled down the drawing-room, stopped to speak to Madame Duval, then, apparently stimulated by her anxiety, renewed the search near the chaise-longue. Stanton, watching him, could not help admiring his histrionic power in spite of his contempt for the man himself. Suddenly there was a delighted exclamation. The debutante an across the room, holding up the jewel to Madame Duval.

"It was between the back and the seat of your chair. It must have slipped down at the very first."

Madame Duval clapped her hands, then kissed the girl on both cheeks.

"You dear! Did you find it?"

"No! Mr. Millward found it. He was suddenly inspired to look in the unlikely places."

Madame Duval swept across the room, holding out expressive, grateful hands.

"Mr. Millward, I am, indeed, your debtor. You searched so faithfully."

"Who would not search forever to relieve you of an instant's anxiety?" he replied. "And now that you have your treasure I have to ask your pardon for leaving before you. I have a friend who is ill, and I have promised to look in on him this evening."

Veronica, coming up at that moment, he repeated his excuses. She thanked him for relieving them all of a great anxiety. With a ceremonious farewell to the company, in which Stanton was elaborately included, Millward took his departure.

"YOU haven't explained the mystery—but whether you ever explain it matters little. Somehow, somehow, you saved us from a most awkward situation."

All the dinner guests had departed except Stanton, who was standing with his hostess before the fireplace. Both were conscious of deeper issues than the loss and recovery of Madame's sapphire.

"I did what I did—for you."

She was silent, and he added:

"All these last years have been for you."

In the stillness that followed his words it seemed to her that he must hear the loud beating of her heart, the yearning reply of her spirit that all her life was for him. The interlude of her dreary marriage, too dreary even to be called unhappy, had only made that consciousness sharper and brighter, sharp and bright as a knife, she sometimes thought, turning and turning in her heart.

He read her answer in her face.

Later, when they had emerged a little from their trance of complete happiness, her mind went back over the evening as if to trace the steps that had led to this hour of fulfillment.

"Tell me," she questioned. "Were you really unable to read the riddle on the square of embroidery—or was it something you didn't care to say to them all?"

He smiled.

"I could read it, but to translate it would have seemed rather pompous—particularly after Millward had failed."

"Tell me what it said."

"It was simply the statement of the woman who embroidered the square that she did not steal the ruby for the theft of which she was imprisoned. With her own eyes she had seen the man she loved take it; but to shield him she had accepted the guilt."

"How curious! The man was a countryman of hers, I suppose."

Stanton hesitated a moment.

"No, he was—a foreigner. Even his name is worked into the border, so you must never allude to the story lest some Oriental scholar ask to interpret the characters."

"I shall put the embroidery away," Veronica said, "the record it bears is too sad."

"But even she found hope in it. Cherry-blossom—her name she says is Cherry-blossom—wove something here where the letters grow faintly rose and gold. They read: 'Love is a mighty god. I serve him gladly.'"

She raised her face to his—full of a happy light.

"And so will we," she finished.

THE END.

The Story of a Villain Who Became a Hero

THE MOST KINDEST CUT

By WILLIAM HUGO PABKE

ILLUSTRATED BY E. J. DINSMORE

JIMMIE JENNINGS the villain, approached the alluring young person in the Gainsborough hat and patches, who smiled at him engagingly from her perch on a high step-ladder. His progress was only slightly retarded by the sword that dangled between his long legs, which fact proved beyond peradventure that he usually arrived at his desired goal irrespective of obstacles.

"Hello," he said, genially enough for a villain.

Jane Justin gazed down at him quizzically for a long moment before she replied: "After mature deliberation, I must answer your question with an unqualified negative."

"What question?" asked Jimmie, bewildered.

"The question you were just about to ask."

"I wasn't!"

"I will never, never become your wife," she said, ignoring his assertion.

"Hold on, Jane! There's a limit!" protested Jimmie, aggrieved. "I don't mind your refusing me when I propose to you—that is, I've got used to it—but I won't stand for your declaring that you're not going to marry me before I ask you."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed his tormentor, eyes dancing with elfin mischief, tiny nose up-tilted. "You were just on the point of it."

"I wasn't! Since you have broached the subject, however, we might as well thrash it out. Why won't you marry me?"

"It's your name," she averred, cocking her head judicially.

"That's the reason, this time, is it? They're getting pretty thin, these reasons of yours. You will have run the whole gamut of them soon; and then—and then —"

"It's your name," repeated Jane inexorably. "What self-respecting girl would allow herself to be called Mrs. James Jennison Jane Justin Jennings? Too many J's in the combination. They're so common, too! It it were Z's, or Q's —" She rested her chin on her hand and gazed meditatively across the stage.

"My dear young friend," began Jimmie, his manner laying the foundation of immediate trouble in the nature of sharp disciplinary measures—"My dear young friend, don't you know that, when a girl marries, she drops some of the handles that have been attached to her up to the time of that important occasion? You will be plain Mrs. James Jennings. What's the matter with that? That's a name to swear by!"

"At," corrected Jane, smiling sweetly.

On the other side of the curtain, the members of the Glendale Country Club with their guests were beginning to trickle into the Casino. A rattle of instrument cases announced the arrival of the orchestra, the component parts of which forthwith engaged in the unlovely task of tuning up, a fact that was made apparent by the staccato picking of a violin tested and found wanting by a half-tone or so. The violinist struggled with his refractory A-string, mastered it, and commenced a short-lived solo rather resembling "Everybody's Doing It." A flute interrupted the classic, a cornet tooted a few toots, then silence. At the sharp tap of the leader's baton, the overture burst forth, sending a tremor of knee-weakening, heart-sickening stage-fright through the group of young people in eighteenth-century garb who were chattering excitedly in the wings.

Major Willoughby, stout of body, perspiring of countenance, came trotting around the sharp corner of a purple-shadowed tree, and bumped the step-ladder. He stopped, muttering something anent the hardships of amateur stage-management in general and this specific job in particular. Peering up in the semi-darkness, he perceived the heroine.

"I've a good mind to run away with you to-night."

"I've been looking everywhere for you, Lady Alison," he exclaimed peevishly. "You're not ready—nobody's ready!" He stepped back, and collided with the villain. "And you, too, Sir Mortimer! Humph. I might have known barked; "it's the other side, anyway." He trotted out into the glare of the stage to harangue another reprehensibly unready group.

"I suppose I really ought to go," sighed Jimmie ruefully.

He held out his arms for Jane and lowered her slowly. As her face came opposite his, she threw back her head, will-o'-the-wisps of mischief in her eyes belying the severity of her lips pressed together primly. "Jimmie!" she said imperiously.

He let go suddenly, and her little heels struck the floor with a sharp double tap.

"I wasn't going to!" declared the villain, his honest soul shining out of guileless eyes.

"Really, I wasn't!"

"I should hope not!" exclaimed the heroine, holding herself proudly erect.

"Oh, Jane, I wish I knew whether you were stringing me or not! I'm going to take a chance—I'm going to persist—"

"Skip!" cried Jane, clutching his shoulder with frantic clasp and spinning him around. "The curtain!"

JIMMIE dived behind the back drop as the curtain rose. He stumbled headlong through the dark passage, his elbows and knees and wildly swinging sword beating an irregular tattoo on the seamy side of Lady Alison's ancestral hall to the delight of the audience, who applauded the realistic depiction of an old English manor in the throes of a seismic disturbance.

"You mutt!" hissed the Duke, who was having trouble with the ruffles at his wrists. "You'll queer the whole blooming show if you don't brace up!"

"Don't get excited, Billy—I mean Your Grace—I'm here with bells on." The imperturbable Jimmie grinned at Billy Lancaster, who presented a most wilted appearance, ruffles and all, due to a nervousness that bordered on hysteria. "Listen! The faithful retainer is just concluding his few remarks."

From the stage came in a squeaky falsetto: "Since Sir Mortimer's returned from furrin parts!"

Jimmie swashbuckled into Sir Charles's drawing-room, and the action of the play commenced.

It was an absent-minded villain who plotted black infamies; his thoughts were with the girl in the wings. Subconsciously, he repeated his well-learned lines, while the witchery of her smile danced before his eyes, alluring, mocking. Jane and he had been brought very close during rehearsals—very close—and yet, and yet—Jimmie's mind trailed off in recollection of her vague elusiveness. At times, he had felt that he had almost won her—almost—and then, she had turned from him with her tantalizing laugh. And Jimmie had had the good sense to laugh back. If he could only make her view him in a serious light! If something would only happen! He spoke the Duke's entering cue, and Billy Lancaster sidled on, a pathetic personification of abject stage-fright.

In spite of all, the scene went swimmingly. Billy's terror carried across the footlights an impression of agitation and emotion in keeping with his part, while Jimmie's negligence was translated into a wonderfully acted effrontery. The villain consciously longed for the end of the scene when Jane would make her appearance. He had reached that stage of infatuation in which it became an inestimable boon to gaze at her in mute adoration.

The Duke brought his speech to an agitated close, bowed with what he fondly imagined to be an extreme hauteur, and withdrew. The

"I'd find you where Miss Justin was!" "Surest thing you know," acquiesced Jimmie, unabashed.

"For the love of Mike!" exploded the Major. "Get over on the other side; the Duke is waiting for you."

"Does Jimmie make his entrance left stage or right?" asked Jane innocently. She had an idea that the Major did not know one from the other.

He forthwith proved the accuracy of her surmise. "It doesn't matter what you call it," he could take the audience into his confidence in a few short, hissed sentences, and paused while the heroine entered from the rear centre. She stood a moment, holding the picture, an inquiring look on her upturned face.

It was then that Jimmie committed the unpardonable sin. He turned his back squarely to the footlights.

"Gee, Jane, you do look stunning!" he said in rapid tones.

"Shut up," answered his heart's desire, succinctly. Then, as Lady Alison: "You, Sir Mortimer! What audacity!"

Jonathan Leighton, in the front row, giggled; her sense of hearing was abnormally sharp. Doctor Leighton laid a restraining hand on his daughter's arm and reproved her with his kindly glance.

At the end of the act, Jimmie wandered aimlessly about the stage, wholly oblivious of the revilings, the jeers, the coaxings of the amateur scene-shifters, whose magical building operations were rendered doubly difficult by his meanderings. He missed Jane, who had run to her dressing-room to change. He couldn't think very clearly because there was no place to put his hands; the eighteenth-century nether garments that adorned his legs were woefully lacking in side pockets. He continued his vague peregrinations until the step-ladder loomed before him. There, he stopped and waited patiently. Presently, Jane appeared, radiant in her new finery.

"Pretty classy future duchess; don't you think, Jimmie?" She cried, the excitement of success flushing her cheeks as she climbed to her favorite seat.

Jimmie regarded her in awestruck wonder. Her beauty sent the blood pounding through his veins with a disconcerting throb, throb. It was impossible! He couldn't expect that this glorious being would ever stoop to him.

"Oh, Jane!" he breathed. The jumbled thoughts that had tormented him during the first act rushed into his mind. "Jane, if you would only take me seriously——"

"Not now, at all events," she murmured, her adorable dimples deepening for an infinitesimal part of a second with the fleetingest of little tender smiles.

"Later?" he urged.

The tender smile broadened, grew merry, burst into a little mocking laugh. She had eluded him again!

"You will let me take you home in my car—you and I alone?" he pleaded.

"Glorious! Romantic! Of course, I will!" she cried, clapping her hands.

"If something serious doesn't happen pretty soon, I'm going to do something to help it along," said Jimmie doggedly. "I've a good mind to run away with you to-night."

"Let's do!" she acquiesced, eyes sparkling. "Let's ride and ride and ride—until—until——"

"Yes?"

"Until the gasoline gives out."

The act had commenced a few moments before. Jane rose as she heard the speech that preceded her cue, and fled stageward, smiling over her shoulder as she ran. Jimmie had only a few moments in which to dream of the ride home through the moonlit night with Jane at his side. He meant it to count for something. He would break through that intangible wall of her making—that wall of laughter, of elusiveness. Something lay behind it—something adorable that belonged to him. He wanted it.

He heard his cue spoken in the voice that thrilled him. Little shivers ran up and down his spine; for the first time that evening, he felt nervous. This was the big scene, the crucial test of the play that meant so much to these friends of his who were working hard for the welfare and the prestige of the club. In justice to them, he must acquit himself creditably, and that meant forgetting his personal aspirations for the next quarter-hour.

"Steady up, old man!" he muttered as he stepped on the stage, and became Sir Mortimer again.

The action of the scene was swift. He forgot himself in the part. Lady Alison had discovered his perfidy; she taunted him with his plotting against her good name, her happiness, and her estate. He boasted of his inquiries, of the fact that he held her in the hollow of his hand. She resorted to pleading, at which he frowned, to invective, at which he laughed—a very proper villain. The climax was at hand. Lady Alison made a final impassioned appeal, which met with a sneer. She turned in desperation, snatched a rapier from the wall, and faced her persecutor.

"Do not forget, Sir Mortimer, that I am a soldier's daughter!" she quoted.

Sir Mortimer smiled coldly, disdainfully. Nevertheless, he hooked his left elbow slightly to receive

More Curiosity in Homemaking

By ANITA HILL BAIRD.

THE echoes of the laugh called forth by the mere suggestion that the Home-maker requires a higher development of this much-maligned but very necessary instinct (yes, we agree, when rightly used), we can still hear dying away in the distance. However, we are glad of that laugh for we hope it will produce the effect a laugh always does and that, in consequence, you will be prepared to bear with us and later, we hope, agree with us.

Did you ever stop and consider that there was less curiosity or "a desire to know" in Homemaking than in any other profession? It is the instinct of curiosity which arouses the medical profession to find something new as a result of which they are able to alleviate pain or cure disease. Wishing to make a bigger "turn-over" the manufacturer wonders if he can work out some new method which will mean a greater output with the same amount of labor. The same instinct leads the engineer or inventor down through narrow, long and, what seem to us, mysterious paths back from which they bring us the labor-saving device—be it vast machine or tiny instrument. Desire to have better stock which will bring better prices and increased capital induces the farmer to find out if he cannot feed his animals in such a way as will bring him these results.

Do you think it an instinct to be decried? (Put to the right use of course). Has its proper use never helped you? Is it not as valuable in our profession as in any other profession or business? The making of homes! The foundation on which our nation and its standards are built. Is there any other profession which requires it more? Why not let us employ it? Alas! Allowing it to go to seed has had disastrous results. Think of the many babies that never "grew up" or, if so, have been slaves to indigestion because there was not enough "desire to know" exercised in the home to find out how they should be fed. How often we hear "Grandmother brought up ten of a family and she never had any special diet for them." Did you ever stop and think that Grandmother did the best she knew and had not the means of satisfying her curiosity that we have to-day? Again, did you ever take into consideration the many ills these famous families fall heir to after they reach maturity due to improper feeding in childhood? If we are to keep abreast of the times we must be curious enough to learn what the times bring forth. Without curiosity there will be no progress.

Frederick Taylor let his curiosity lead him to study among other things, the methods men followed in building brick walls. And what was the result? New methods were evolved; more brick wall was built in a given time; aching backs were eliminated and, most important of all, the worker was not as tired at night, was capable of taking more interest and playing a greater part in home and community life. Doctor and Mrs. Frank Gilbreth, allowing their curiosity to be aroused, have saved valuable hours and much fatigue to many a worker as a result of their motion studies.

We cannot all be efficiency engineers like Frederick Taylor, nor motion study students like Doctor and Mrs. Gilbreth; but, letting our curiosity be stimulated by their suggestions, we can carry on our work more successfully and be efficiency engineers and motion study students for ourselves.

Let us ask ourselves: Are we spending our time and energy unnecessarily? Are we curious to notice if the low sink is guilty of causing the backache? Is it a dull knife which makes us take so long to prepare vegetables? Is the tea-pot in the cupboard, the tea in the far store-room, and the stove—I leave its place to your imagination. Is the cup of tea a better product for that long walk demanded in its preparation? I leave the question with you. Is your shadow always in your way when working at the kitchen table? Did you ever stop to think how this unconsciously irritated you?

If the manufacturer finds it to his advantage to cultivate curiosity in order to devise better methods in his factory; if the doctor finds it means progress in his profession, is it not "up to" the Home-maker to cultivate it in her profession?

the thrust between arm and breast—Major Willoughby had shown him how. Lady Alison advanced two little running steps, as she had been taught in rehearsal, stumbled slightly—which was an innovation—and struck.

Sir Mortimer crumpled up at her feet and lay quite still, effectively still as the curtain rustled down on the end of the second act amidst a flattering thunder of applause from in front.

"Well done! By Jove! Well done!" congratulated the Major, trotting to the centre of the stage as Jane flew to her dressing-room for the final change. "Sir Mortimer—Jimmie, you did fine! Leap out now and give us a chance to set the terrace scene."

Jimmie, however, did not heed; he seemed to find his recumbent position eminently satisfactory. The Major stood over him a moment. His jaws snapped suddenly shut. Into his eyes leaped the cool, self-reliant look of the man who has seen service.

"Jimmie, old man!" he said, the rasp of command in his voice penetrating to the fogged brain.

Jimmie stirred; his eyes opened. "Major," he gasped, "please—don't let—Jane know."

"Is it bad?" asked the Major, his voice steady.

But Jimmie had quietly drifted away into dreamland.

THROUGH long, long ages, Jimmie floated in rose-colored mists. The fleecy clouds opened above; floods of clear sunlight poured down from a bright blue sky. His eyes snapped open and encountered a bearded face bending over him, which seemed, somehow familiar.

He thought hard for a moment, then: "Are—you—dead—too, Doctor?" he asked wonderingly.

Doctor Leighton laughed his big, hearty laugh. "You're not dead, my boy! Ha! Ha!"

Jimmie retired to his clouds again, the big voice reverberating through the wide spaces, filling his ears with a sound akin to the music of the spheres. "Not dead, my boy! Ha! Ha! My boy! Ha! Ha! Not dead! Ha! Ha!" Through eons and eons, he heard the refrain. He tried to puzzle out its meaning. It was almost clear, when a comforting blackness surging up about him ended, for the time being, the weary labor of his brain.

When next he awoke, a white-capped young woman with smooth, light hair was bending over him. Her eyes lighted with a bright smile of welcome. He regarded her wistfully as her image wavered before him, steadied, and became permanent.

"You're beautiful," he murmured drowsily, "beautiful—but—but——" His voice trailed off in vague longing.

The young woman smiled again, cheerily, understandingly. "I know," she said. "Be patient. To-morrow, I promise ——"

But Jimmie was sleeping as peacefully as a baby.

Through the long day and the longer night, he slept. Life crept back into his strong young body; nature deemed him fit. Hour by hour, minute by minute, he regained his foothold. At last, he heard a voice saying:

"This is to-morrow."

He turned his head. The white-capped young woman stood before him.

"This is to-morrow," she repeated.

"Yes?" said Jimmie politely. He really was not greatly interested.

She stepped to the door, spoke a few words to some one in the corridor, and disappeared. It was all very interesting, and Jimmie closed his eyes again. From the doorway, somebody spoke his name, softly. At the sound, Jimmie's interest in life returned with such surprising suddenness that he forgot the hampering bandages. He tried to raise himself without much success, however.

"Jane!" he gasped, as he sank back on his pillow.

She came toward him with a little running step, her arms held out yearningly.

"Did man ever have a more compliant sweetheart?" she said, an April smile lighting her face. "Oh, Jimmie! You wanted something serious to happen—and I—stupid I—did my best." The tears welled up in her eyes, and overflowed.

"It's the first time I've ever seen you cry, dear," said Jimmie, with a catch in his voice. "You—you won't laugh me away this time?"

"No, no!" She dropped on her knees beside him, and her arm crept under his head. "It's for always," she whispered.

He sighed peacefully, then turned toward her with a whimsical smile on his lips.

"You might practice on my other side when I get well," he suggested drowsily; "it would be worth it." His eyes closed. "Jane," he murmured, "I'm happy—happy ——"

THE END.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

Garth Pevensey, a young New York journalist, meets, in the North Country, Natalie Maby, whose mother-in-law asks him to conduct her safely to the Bishop of Miwasa. Garth undertakes the journey and Natalie informs him that she had been married years before to Herbert Maby, who had immediately vanished on a western journey, and whose course since then has been an evil one. She, however, has promised his mother to find him. They meet Nick Grylls, a villainous character, who falls in love with Natalie and contrives that they always miss the Bishop. They find a friend in the boy settler, Charley Landrum, and secure the boat "Loseis," only to find Grylls on board. Finally a heavy storm overtakes them. Grylls attacks Pevensey and both are swept overboard. Grylls is finally overpowered and Garth leaves him insensible on the shore. Garth and Natalie finally part from Charley and go on in their search for Maby, whom they find in wretched and debased condition.

CHAPTER XV.

IN spite of herself Natalie's voice softened as she delivered her pitiful plea; but it was not from any kindness for him. "She has been very kind to me all these years," she went on, "and I, to ease her what I could of the torment of her mind during her last days, volunteered to go with her to find you. Her age and her infirmities prevented her from coming any farther than Prince George. I have been fortunate in finding friends who have assisted me the rest of the way. I have come to beg you, on behalf of your mother, to let her see you before she dies. She is waiting in Prince George. She bade me tell you that neither poverty, misfortune nor disgrace could abate any of her love for you; that she would die happy if she might once more press your hand against her cheek."

Garth watched Maby narrowly while Natalie was speaking. He saw by the man's rapt expression that her voice charmed his senses, while the purport of what she said was wholly lost on his consciousness. When her voice broke a little at the close, Maby's lips parted, and his breath came quicker—but it was no tenderness for a devoted parent, only a passion purely selfish, that caused his lack-lustre eyes to glitter again.

"These letters," concluded Natalie, drawing them forth as she spoke, "three of which I have brought from the post office, and the fourth which she gave me herself, will let you know, better than I can tell you, what she feels."

Maby took the letters; and thrusting them carelessly in his pocket—one fell to the ground and lay there unheeded—snatched back at Natalie's hand, and attempted to retain it. Reining her horse back, she wrenched it free.

A little shame reached the seat of Maby's consciousness. He reddened. "I'm not a leper," he muttered. "You came to me of your own free will, didn't you?"

"Build nothing on that!" said Natalie instantly and clearly. "I allow no claim on me!"

Maby quickly changed to obsequiousness. "I don't want to quarrel with you, Natalie," he whined. "Especially not after what you've just done!"

He went to his bench again; and sat heavily. Again he struck his forehead with his knuckles. "Gad! I can't yet realize it is you that is here!"

Natalie looked at Garth as much as to say that she had accomplished what she came for.

The look was not lost on Maby. He sprang up. "I'll do just what you want!" he said hurriedly. "I'll start for Prince George at once—to-day—this minute! God knows there's nothing to keep me here! You have a spare horse, I suppose. I've nothing but that galled cayuse and another as bad!" He uttered his cracked laugh in a tone that was intended to be ingratiating. "That's the advantage of poverty! I've no preparations to make; so lead on!"

Natalie paused irresolutely. This was a contingency she had not foreseen. She shuddered at the possibilities it opened up. In her perplexity she looked again at Garth.

"We will leave you a horse," said he curtly. "And your passage out from the lake Settlement will be arranged for."

"And what money you need," added Natalie in a low tone, and blushing painfully.

But Maby's feelings were not hurt. "I can go with you just as well," he blustered.

"You may follow us as soon as you choose," said Garth coolly. "We do not desire your company on the way."

For the first time Maby appeared to recognize Garth's presence on the scene. He turned a baleful eye on him; and his lips curled back over his gums. "Who are you?" he snarled, adding an oath.

"That is neither here nor there," said Garth. "I speak for Miss Bland."

"Mrs. Maby, you mean," sneered the other, thinking to crush him with the information.

"She does not use that name," returned Garth imperturbably.

Maby turned furiously to Natalie. "Who is this man?" he cried, his cracked voice sliding into falsetto: "this sleek young sprig that rides alone with you through the country! I demand to know! I have a right to know!"

"I admit no right!" Natalie said firmly.

Maby, beside himself with jealous rage, no longer knew what he said. "You won't explain," he cried. "You can't explain! Here's a nasty situation for a married woman!"

Garth's self-control, stretched on the rack through all this scene, suddenly snapped in twain. Temper with Garth took the form of laughter; mocking, dangerous laughter, that issued startlingly from his grave lips.

He laughed now. "You scoundrel!" he said in cool, incisive tones—though he was not a whit less blinded by passion than Maby himself—"after the kind of life you've been leading up here, have you still the assurance to lay a claim upon her! And to cast a reflection on her good name! Have you no mirror to see what you are? Go to the lake, then, and see the vile record written on your face!"

Maby was staggered. Garth's terrible scorn penetrated the last wrappings of the warmly nurtured ego within. He shot a startled glance at Garth; and from Garth to the hut and behind, as if wondering how much he knew.

Garth was not through with him. He slipped his stirrups, preparatory to leaping off his horse. Natalie trembled at the quiet man's new aspect.

"Garth!" she entreated urgently.

The sound of her voice recalled him to himself. Settling back in his saddle, he abruptly turned his horse, and went off a little way, struggling to regain his self-command.

"Oh, Natalie!" Maby gabbled whiningly; "don't listen to him. He's a low cur! But he can't make trouble between you and me! Send him away! Natalie, I seem to have acted badly; but I can explain everything! Circumstances were all against me! In my heart I've never swerved from you! I dream of you every night in my lonesomeness! Wherever I look I see your face before my eyes!"

Maby, conceiving nothing of the sublime irony of the figure he made, continued to plead. "Natalie, don't turn away from me! You took me for better or worse, remember! You found me at a disadvantage to-day; I don't look like this ordinarily. And you can make whatever you like of me! Remember the old days at home! I am the same man—Bert—your Bert! Look—he can't see us—I kneel to you as I did then!"

And down he went on his knees, stretching out his arms to her.

There was an odd, slight sound behind him. They both looked—and froze in the attitude of looking. Garth from his station, seeing the new look of horror overspread Natalie's face, spurred to join her.

There, clinging to the corner of the cabin for support, stood the figure of a woman. Her brown skin was blanched to a livid yellow; and her eyes were the eyes of one dead from a shock. She swayed forward from the waist as if her backbone could no longer support her. At her feet a tin pail emptied wild cherries on the ground.

Maby scrambled to his feet, shamed, chagrined, furious. "What do you want around here?" he cried brutally—even now seeking to outface her.

The piteous, stricken girl moistened her lips; and essayed more than once to speak, before any words came. "Erbe't, who is this woman?" she said quite simply at last.

"What is that to you?" he blustered roughly, thinking to beat her down; perhaps to kill her outright with cruelty. "This is my wife!"

"Oh, no! no!" whispered Natalie, sick with the sight of so much misery.

It is doubtful if the girl heard her. She tottered forward; and seized and clung to Maby's arm. Her breast was heaved on lard, quick pants like a wounded animal's; and her eyes were as frantic, and as inhuman.

"Erbe't, who am I?" she breathed.

Maby, seeing that Natalie heard and understood, beside himself, and reckless with rage, flung out his arm, throwing her heavily to the ground. "You! damn you!" he cried. "You're just my —"

Natalie, with a low cry of horror, instinctively clapped her heels to her horse's ribs, and set off down the hill. Garth wheeled after her.

"Oh, stay—stay and help her!" she gasped.

"You come first!" said Garth grimly.

Maby, as Natalie turned, sprang after her; and running desperately, managed to cling to her stirrup. Casting off the last vestiges of manliness he wept and prayed her to wait for him. Her horse, Caspar, kicked out wildly, and struck him off. He lay on the ground sobbing and cursing; striving to drag himself along with clawing hands.

Just before they gained the watercourse, Garth looked over his shoulder; and his heart leapt into his throat. The brown woman was reaching for Maby's rifle. He shouted a warning; and desperately strove to throw his horse behind Natalie. But it was too late. Hard upon his voice, the shot voice. A strange, low cry broke from Natalie; and she reeled in her saddle. Garth spurring ahead, gripped her by the back of the neck and caught her from falling. A more terrible blow than the hurt of a bullet, smote his own breast.

CHAPTER XVI

NATALIE WOUNDED

THE two men struggled over the water-entire, and gained the trees before Garth, hampered as he was, succeeded in drawing their heads together, and stopping them. Slipping out of the saddle without loosening his grasp of Natalie, he lifted her off, ever careful to shield her from possible further shots with his own body. He remembered Mabyn's was a single-shot weapon; and he counted on the time it would take the Indian woman to obtain ammunition, and reload. Quickly and tenderly laying Natalie on the ground under shelter of a stump, he unslung his own rifle. But as he dropped to his knees, and raised it, he saw the woman on the edge of the cut-bank swing the stock of her gun around her head, and send the weapon spinning out over the water. Meanwhile Mabyn was running up the hill toward her with significant action.

Natalie's left arm hung useless; and a soaking crimson stain spread broadly on her sleeve between elbow and shoulder. Her face had gone chalky white, her eyes were half closed, and her teeth were set painfully in her blue nether lip. Garth's first and instinctive thought was to return and seize the hut; so that he might at least have a roof to cover her.

At the first move he made in the direction of the hut, Natalie, whom he had thought unconscious, divined his intention.

"Garth! Not in his house!" she murmured feverishly. "I will not go in there! I will not!" He paused in a painful perplexity. "But dearest, there is no other house," he said.

"Put me down in the open air," she begged. "It would suffocate me! I will not endure it!"

So Garth turned back among the trees. He strode over the dead leaves and the pine needles to the lake shore. Here, between the willows that grew thickly at the water's verge, and the heavier timber, extended an open strip of grass, still fresh and green. He laid his burden down upon it; and, rolling up his coat, put it under her head for a pillow.

He hastily cut away her sleeve, exposing the injury. The ball had passed through, making a clean opening where it entered, and a jagged wound whence it issued. It was clear the bone was broken; but from the character of the bleeding, even Garth could see that the artery was uninjured. He brought water from the lake in his hat, and gently washed the wound; but even in this he doubted if he did right; for the water was cold—but he had nothing in which to heat it.

He had his dark hour then, tasting ultimate despair. He sat beside her, gripping his dull head between his hands, and striving desperately to contrive, where there was nothing to contrive with.

Meanwhile the wound momentarily changed. The arm began to swell and darken; and Garth knew there was no time to lose. He made one attempt to proceed, kneading the flesh of the arm very gently to explore the broken ends of the bone—but Natalie's piteous cry of pain completely unmanned him. He desisted, shaking like a leaf, and sick with compassion; and he knew he would never be able to do it.

What seemed like an age passed; though it was no more than a few minutes. He was bending over her, doing what little he could to ease her pain; and with knotted brows rapidly considering, and rejecting, one after another, the desperate expedients that suggested themselves. Suddenly looking up he perceived among the trees, at a distance of a few paces, Rina standing. Hot anger instantly welled up in his breast, and made a red blur before his eyes. Rina's sex was no protection to her then. He picked up his gun.

Observing the action, Rina mutely spread her hands, palms outward. Her entire aspect had changed; the storm of passion had passed; and she stood contrite and sullen. It was impossible for the blindest passion to shoot at a figure in such an attitude. Garth lowered his gun; but he still kept it across his knees, and his face did not relax. The woman was loathsome to him.

"What do you want?" he demanded coldly.

Rina came a little closer. "I sorry," she said sulkily—like a child unwillingly confessing a fault. "I t'ink I go looney for a while. I not hear right. I t'ink she try to tak' my 'osban' from me!"

Garth glanced at the suffering Natalie with contracted brows. "That's all very well!" he said bitterly. "But it can't undo what's done!"

"I can mak' her well, maybe," said Rina, still affecting indifference. "I know what to do. My mother, she teach me. If you let me look at her, I tell you."

A wild hope sprang up in Garth's breast. If the girl were only able to help Natalie, his hate of her could very well content itself a while. But dare he trust her? With keen, hard eyes he sought to read her face. Her own eyes avoided his; and she made a picture of savage indifference; but as he looked he saw two great tears roll down her cheeks. In his desperate situation it was well worth the risk.

Raising his gun, he said coldly: "You may look at her. If you try to injure her, I will send a bullet through your head."

Receiving the permission, Rina came forward, careless of the threatening gun; and dropped to her knees beside Natalie. She examined the wound on both sides; and felt of the fracture with delicate fingers. To judge of the normal position of the bones, she manipulated her own arm. Garth never took his eyes from her but she was tenderer with the patient than he could have been.

Finally she raised a mask-like face to Garth. "I can fix it," she said. "If you let me."

The Homesteader's Wife

By ALICE M. MACRAE.

The evening light grows dim—
I shade my eyes and watch for him

Along the drifted trail.
Darkly the clouds close in,
The coyote's mournful din
Answers the dog's long wail.

Oh, to be so alone!
My heart is cold and hard as stone,
My voice is dumb.
Like moving in a dream—
The hours of working seem—
God, will he never come?

See! I have put the light
Where it will greet him, burning bright.
The supper, too, is spread.
The milk is put away,
The cattle fed their hay,
And all the horses fed.

• Ranger, who saw me grieve,
Nuzzled his head against my sleeve,
As if he understood.
And feeding him his grain,
I cried beneath his mane,
To ease my solitude.

Listen! Was that a hail?
The dogs are barking down the trail!
How foolish were my fears!
I'll run and close the gate—
He'll be too cold to wait—
Three days were like three years!

Whatever her private feelings were, she had a confident air, that could not but convey some assurance to him. He nodded silently, after what he had suffered, he scarcely dared believe in such good fortune.

Rina quickly rose. "You mak' a fire to heat water," she said coolly. "I go bring everyt'ing."

With the words, she was gone among the trees; and Garth, overjoyed to be able to do something with his hands, hastened to build a fire.

Before he really expected her, she was back with what she needed, a pot for heating the water, a basin, several kinds of herbs, some strips of yellowed linen for bandages, a blanket and a knife. While the water was heating, she cut a deep segment of the smooth white bark of a young poplar for a splint—the curve of it was judged to a nicety to fit Natalie's arm. During the operation of setting the bone, Garth watched her unswervingly, clenching his teeth to bear the spectacle of Natalie's agony. For every pang of hers he suffered a sharper; the sweat coursed down his face.

But at last it was over; the wound washed and fomented with bruised leaves, the splint fitted snug, and the whole neatly bandaged. Natalie, wrapped in the blanket, soon fell into the sleep of exhaustion.

Rina looked at the pale and shaken Garth with an odd expression. "If you have whiskey, better tak' a drink," she suggested.

Garth had his flask; and he obeyed without question.

Throughout the operation, Rina had preserved an admirable, professional air, intent and impersonal; and when necessary she had brusquely ordered Garth to help her. Now that it was all over her face altered; she continued to kneel at Natalie's side, gazing at her soft hair, and the whiteness of her skin with a kind of sad and jealous wonder.

Garth on the alert at the change, which portended he knew not what explosion of passion in the savage woman's breast, ordered her from Natalie's side. She obeyed, resuming her sullen mask, but lingered near him, plainly full of some question she desired to ask. He observed for the first, a purpling bruise above her temple. Rina saw his eyes upon it, and her color changed.

"I run against a tree," she hastily volunteered. At the same time her hand stole to her throat to hide certain marks on its dusky roundness. Garth knew instinctively that she was loyally lying. Mabyn had beaten her. He wondered how far the wish to serve the woman she had injured was Rina's own impulse and how far she had been forced to it by Mabyn. He began dimly to conceive that the red woman had good qualities.

At last the question on her breast was spoken. "Who is she?" she asked, pointing sullenly at the sleeping Natalie.

GARTH rapidly considered what he should answer. He could not pretend to himself that he had forgiven the woman but since Natalie's pain was mitigated he was cooler and his sense of justice forced it home on him that Rina, too, had been through her ordeal. In his present desperate situation, his only chance of assistance lay in her—Mabyn was an egomaniac and utterly irresponsible. Frankness had served Garth in good stead before this and finally he told her the plain truth in such terms that she could understand.

"This feeling Mabyn has for her," he insisted in the end, "is only a passing one. If we can get her out of his sight all will go on as before."

Rina nodded. Her inscrutable face softened a little, he thought. "I on'erstan' now," she said quietly. "So I not go crazy wit' t'inking about it."

Garth was glad he had told her.

Rina stood studying him with her strange and secret air. "You love her ver' moch," she said suddenly, pointing to Natalie.

Garth bent over the sleeping figure in a way that answered her better than words.

"I t'ink she love you too," said Rina gravely. "When I 'urt her, she try not to cry because it 'urt you so bad."

A slow red crept under Garth's skin. He hated to betray himself under the eyes of the red woman; and he bustled about, averting his face from her. "When can she be moved?" he asked, brusquely changing the subject.

Rina shook her head. "I not know," she said. "Maybe she have fever. Three, four week maybe."

Garth's heart sank heavily, as he considered their scanty supplies, the approach of winter—and, more dangerous still, the fruitful opportunities of conflict the weeks would offer to four souls so strangely opposed, and so strangely bound together in the wilderness.

"What is Mabyn doing now?" he asked suddenly.

Rina's face instantly became as blank as plaster. "I not talk to you about him," she said coolly.

Garth was conscious of receiving a rebuke. "But I help you," she added presently. "I go bring your outfit in."

Before she went, she brewed a draught for Natalie with some of the herbs she had brought; and instructed Garth to administer it when she woke. For an instant all Garth's suspicions returned; and he looked at her hard. Rina, divining his thought, coolly lifted the pail to her lips, and drank of it. Once more he felt himself rebuked.

Left alone, his thoughts reverted to Mabyn. What would he have been plotting all 'his time?—he wondered; what stand would he take in this new posture of affairs? It was too much to hope, he decided, that one so selfish and so jealous could be persuaded to sink his animosity against Garth, for the purpose of serving Natalie while she lay injured. Garth's business had made him more or less familiar with the workings of the diseased ego and he was convinced that Mabyn, if for nothing else, hated him intolerably for having been the spectator of his repulse by Natalie.

As time passed, Natalie began to stir and mutter in her sleep and Garth, bending over her, fearful of fever, put the man out of his head. Returning to her from the edge of the lake, with cloths wrung out of cold water, he found her with wide eyes and flushed cheeks.

"Send him away! Send him away!" she muttered. "I cannot have him near me!"

At first he thought her mind wandered, but following the direction of her eyes, he saw the figure of a man skulking among the trees. Soothing her, he offered Rina's drink; and it had an immediate effect. She dropped off to sleep again. Then Garth picked up his gun and strode toward Mabyn.

The man waited for him with an air oddly mixed of fear and bravado. As Garth came close he smiled in a way that he intended to be ingratiating—but Mabyn's smile only rendered him more hideous. Garth's first look made sure that both his hands were empty.

"Is there anything I can do?" Mabyn asked with apparent solicitude.

"Yes, keep away from here," returned Garth curtly. "If I catch you within a hundred yards of my camp, I'll wing you so you won't move again as long as we're here."

Mabyn assumed an aggrieved expression. "You needn't take that tone," he grumbled. "I came in friendliness. I want to have a talk with you."

"I'm listening," said Garth.

Mabyn twisted uneasily. "Damn it! How can a man make friendly advances when you're standing over him with a gun!" he said.

"Say what you've got to say, or clear out," said Garth.

The aggrieved air proving ineffectual, Mabyn substituted offended silence; offered to go; and came back. "Well, look here!" he said at last. "This is it. Here are the three of us up here —"

"Four," amended Garth.

"Well, four if you like," said Mabyn. "We're stuck here together. We can't afford to quarrel. We've got to have some working agreement."

"Is that all?" said Garth uncompromisingly.

Mabyn looked around with the air of a much-trying man appealing to the bystanders—that they were only indifferent trees, rather spoiled the effect. "I wouldn't take this from any man if it wasn't that I was bent on avoiding trouble," he blustered.

"Look here," he began afresh, with a reasonable air. "I came to offer you the shack for Natalie. She can't sleep in the open in her condition."

"Much obliged," said Garth coolly. "I intended to take it in the first place. But Miss Bland refused to allow herself to be carried there."

Mabyn's eyes bolted. His control over his facial muscles was imperfect; and the struggle between the open character he desired to convey, and the secret feelings that tortured him, was plain. "What are you going to do?" he asked.

"Build her a house," said Garth. "Is that all you have to say?"

The other turned a face of obstinate friendliness and good will. "Look here—" he began all over. "I don't know your name—"

Garth informed him.

"Well, Pevensey, I'm sorry for what passed this morning. I regret what I said. I was only half awake; and scarcely knew what I did. Will you overlook it?"

"Talk is cheap," said Garth guardedly. "I will be guided by your actions henceforth." But his voice was milder; for an apology could not help but speak to his sense of generosity.

Mabyn, encouraged, amplified his penitent, ingratiating air. "As to the future," he said, "I mean to show you. You'll soon be satisfied!" He came closer. "In the meantime let's make a truce! Shake hands on it!"

Garth thoroughly distrusted the man; but he could see no harm to Natalie in accepting his offer, while privately determining to relax none of his vigilance. It was only too true, as Mabyn had said; neither could afford to quarrel. Mabyn had no gun, and Garth could not leave Natalie's side for an instant.

"I am willing," said Garth readily. "But it's understood this doesn't affect what I said before. You are not to come within a hundred yards of this camp!"

Mabyn shrugged, as at the unworthiness of Garth's suspicions.

"You agree to it?" Garth persisted.

"All right!" said Mabyn—a shade too readily. "Shake!"

Garth shifted his gun; and advanced to take Mabyn's hand. The man could not keep an ugly little gleam from showing in his shifty gray eye; and Garth stopped abruptly. Mabyn sneered. Garth, fired by one of the imperious impulses of the blood of youth, strode forward and grasped the extended hand defiantly.

He saw instantly his mistake. Mabyn's face was suddenly transfigured by the deadly hatred he had long repressed. His right hand closed on Garth's like a vice; and at the same time a knife slipped out of his sleeve into the other hand. He jerked the surprised Garth half-way round; and aimed a blow between his shoulders. Garth was oddly conscious of the fresh marks of the whetstone on the blade of the knife. With the incredible swiftness of our subconscious moves, he dropped his useless gun; and twisting his body around, flung up his free hand, and warded the descending blow. Seizing Mabyn's wrist, he flung himself forward to bear the other back.

It was all very brief. Mabyn, braced to receive Garth's weight, held his ground. Inspired with a febrile strength, he enjoyed a temporary advantage. Unable to reach Garth's back, he thrust desperately at his face, his neck—but only stabbed the air. They were locked together with their arms crossed—surely as strange a posture as ever men fought in! But Mabyn had staked all on the first blow; and that failing, there could be but one result. His fictitious strength suddenly failing, he collapsed in Garth's arms. Garth wrenched his hand free and hurled him to the ground where he lay livid and sobbing for breath. The attack had been contrived with devilish cunning; but every design this man undertook in life was foredoomed to failure.

Garth secured the knife; and stood looking down at the broken wretch, with strong waves of disgust welling over him. He laughed briefly.

"Too contemptible to kill!" he said; and turned on his heel.

There, clinging to the corner of the cabin for support, stood the figure of a woman.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE CLUE TO RINA.

RINA brought all four horses handily through the wood, bringing up the rear on the back of old Cy. She slipped off beside Garth and looked in the direction where Natalie lay.

"Still sleeping," Garth said.

As Rina's eyes fell on him, they suddenly widened; and plain fear broke through the mask of her face. "Erbe't been here!" she said breathlessly.

"How do you know?" he said in surprise.

Rina pointed to his belt. "You got his knife!" she said. "How you get his knife?"

"He tried to murder me with it," said Garth, watching her face narrowly.

Rina had no more thought for Natalie. "Where is he?" she said agitatedly. "What you do to him?"

"I let him go," Garth said carelessly. "Murder is not exactly in my line."

"He try to kill you an' you let him go!" she breathed incredulously. Plainly such magnanimity was outside her ken. She walked away from him, considering it.

Presently she came back with a swift glide. "You got to promise me not to 'urt 'Erbe't!" she said, threateningly and passionately.

"If he attacks me, I defend myself—and her," Garth said coolly.

Rina studied the ground. It was impossible for him to tell what was going on behind her inscrutable eyes. In a moment she went to Natalie as if nothing had happened; and dropping beside her, listened attentively to her breathing. Garth, ever watchful, followed her close. When she arose, they moved off a little to avoid disturbing the patient; and Rina briefly instructed Garth what he should do during the night.

Garth, not satisfied with merely knowing what to do, asked the reason of her various measures; whereupon Rina became suddenly evasive.

"But I must know why you do these things," he insisted.

Rina looked away. "I not tell you," she said coolly.

"What does this mean?" he demanded, surprised and frowning.

Rina met his eyes. "Nobody but me can mak' her well," she said boldly. "I mak' her well if you not 'urt 'Erbe't. If you go after 'Erbe't, she can die. I not look at her no more!"

This at least was honest; and Garth could respect such an opponent. "He's safe!" he said coolly. "Provided he keeps away from here."

Rina vouchsafed no comment. "I come to-morrow," she said and disappeared through the trees.

The horses offered Garth his next problem. Since immediately they were turned out they would bolt for the sweet grass of the prairie above, there was no way in which he could secure them from Mabyn, or keep them within reach against a time of need. They might stray for miles over the plains before he could leave Natalie long enough to round them up. But there was no help for it; the beasts would all die of starvation, if he attempted to keep them in his camp. There was a little grass between the willows and the timber and he determined to keep old Cy picketed nearby, to be sure of one mount in the case of an emergency. The other three he hobbled, hung a bell around Emmy's neck, and turned them loose.

He was now able to make Natalie more comfortable. Putting up her tent, he spread a bed of balsam within, and her own blankets upon it. The next time she awoke, he carried her inside; and at the door of the tent, where he could look at her, and speak to her, he cooked her the best invalid's supper the grub-box and his own skill could afford. This same grub-box was an ever-fresh cause of anxiety to him; allowing for liberal contributions from his own gun, he could not see much more than a week's supply for two. This he kept to himself, however, while he joked and made light of their situation for Natalie's benefit.

Some time after supper she fell asleep again; and Garth prepared for his night-long vigil. His head was much too busy to allow of any desire for sleep. Sitting in the dark, he faced the situation open-eyed. There they were in the remotest wilderness, imprisoned in the narrow valley by Natalie's injury for weeks to come; with insufficient food and inclement weather in prospect, and without the remotest chance of succor from the outside. Moreover, there hovered about them an implacable and half-insane enemy, whose busy brain was bent on Garth's destruction. The outlook was enough to unnerve the strongest; there were things in it that Garth in his courage could only glance at, and hurriedly avert the eyes of his mind.

The night was so still he could hear the breathing of the horse at fifty paces. He had let the fire die down, for fear its loud crackling would awaken Natalie. Overhead the Northern lights flung their ragged pennons across the zenith, with a ghostly echo of rustling. He suddenly became conscious of distant human voices in the void of stillness; and presently distinguished the voice of Mabyn. Rina's answers he could not hear, though he sensed a second voice. The sound was from the neighborhood of the hut.

Garth was tempted by the opportunity to discover at the same time the plans of his enemy, and Rina's true disposition toward himself. He glanced at Natalie; she had but lately fallen asleep, and was sleeping soundly; there were no animals abroad that could harm her; he need be gone but half an hour. The role of eavesdropper was not at all attractive to him but he felt he had no right to refuse to use any weapon that offered. Finally he fastened the flaps of Natalie's tent, replenished the fire, and stole away through the trees.

He crossed the stony watercourse to the left of the usual place and mounted the slope. Coming closer, he satisfied himself that the speakers were sitting on the bench at the door of the shack. In the darkness he almost fell across the figure of the little cayuse, prone in the grass. The animal scrambled to its feet and trotted away. Garth paused, listening, his heart in his throat—but Mabyn's voice presently went on undisturbed.

Draperies That Serve the Definite Purpose of Making the Home More Beautiful

An example of the durable materials which are to be found in such effective colorings, and are so inexpensive. There is at present, a demand for stripes and the chintz illustrated proves the interesting way these may be treated. Birds and flowers are here printed in colors that harmonize with stripes of grey, blue and rose, and the cost is ninety-five cents a yard.

A lovely hand-blocked chintz in tones of mahogany, deep creams shading to tan with soft shades of grey and green in the foliage. Also to be had in other combinations and with a black ground. Fifty inches wide, the cost is four dollars and a half a yard.

In this imported chintz, various color treatments have been made, the most attractive of which is the one illustrated. This is obtained by a cream ground with wide stripes of dark coloring, black or dark blue, and design in rose, yellow, brown, green, mulberry or grey. The material is soft and drapes delightfully, and may be bought for ninety-eight cents a yard.

Considering the Curtain and Such Stuff As It Is Made Of

By MONA H. COXWELL

OF all the tasks that confront us when we undertake the furnishing and interior decorating of a home, there is none perhaps, that we approach with more enjoyment than the selection of the curtains and over-draperies which each window of the house will require. There is something especially appealing in the textures that are provided for these purposes and our color sense finds ample satisfaction in the beautiful solid tones and delightful combinations from which the Twentieth Century manufacturer of textiles has made it possible for us to choose.

Impulsive selection, however, may be just as fatal to the final appearance of a room as a willow-plume trimming on a sailor hat, and while it is not altogether necessary to approach the matter with prayer and fasting, it is wise not to be carried away by a single idea, but to consider the question from several angles. We must remember that the treatment of windows has an effect on the appearance of both the inside and outside of the house, and again that a treatment which is charming by day, may be robbed of color and character when the room is filled with illumination by night. The exposure of a room is another point to be thought of, as well as the architecture of the house itself, its location,—whether in town or country—and then, narrowing the matter to individual rooms, we must have regard for the shape of the apartment, the style of furniture that it is to contain and the manner and color in which the walls have been decorated.

Having determined these matters, we may next take stock of materials and consider their suitability. Here we are likely to become lost in a maze of rich and lovely color, in fascinating weaves and textures which leave us with some confusion of mind by their very number and desirability. For our consideration the shopman displays his delectable wares—silken velours, classic French brocades, rich-hued velvets, chintz, plush, poplin, shimmering silks from India, crepes from China, delicate cretonnes, chintz of gorgeous coloring, linen in many wonderful printed patterns—even the Russian crash and demure denim might once have hung on the walls of an Arabian Nights' bazaar!

Finally, out of this riot of lovely weaves and color and texture, our mind should evolve a scheme—our instinct for what is suitable, in other words our "good taste," should assert itself, and we should see clearly what we must reject and what we may accept.

NEARLY all windows require what is known as sash curtains, those of thin transparent material placed close to the glass. The only exception would be the window made of many small panes of glass that are not altogether transparent. These sash curtains serve to soften the glare of the light from the outside and also protect the heavier over-draperies or inside hangings. The sash curtain should harmonize with the ground of the over-draperies—white where the ground is white, or ecru or cream where the ground is of a deeper tone.

In the average city home, elaborate draperies are not appropriate; velours, damask, linen or woollen rep are widely used for the more formal rooms, and these should be made with a certain formality as to valance, edging and heading, and a certain uniformity as to draping which will appear well from the outside. The heavier and more voluminous draperies have gone out of date and are only found in more stately mansions of impressive architecture. Elaborate trimmings are also a thing of the past, greatly to the happiness of every sensible housewife who found them an endless trouble to make and to keep clean.

For bed-rooms in the average home nothing is more attractive than chintz or cretonne in one of the many flower or bird patterns, or, if one does not consider outlay, one of the many new and lovely printed linens which are to-day to be found in the shops.

Where cretonne, linen, chintz, damask, brocade or poplin are used as over-hangings, these should be lined, both to give them body and in the case of the figured materials, to prevent the light from shining through and weakening the effect of the design.

As in the case of wall-paper, which we described in the March issue, certain colors should be chosen to off-set certain light. For a Northern exposure, the window should be draped in material which contains warm shades, such as yellow, orange, or brown. A window looking South may be framed in a light and sunny color, but the sash curtain should be doubly heavy to distribute the full glare of the sun. For East and West windows there are no restrictions as to color or fabric. (CONTINUED ON PAGE 69.)

(Right) A striking material showing the character which is given a design when printed on a black ground. Bright green foliage, birds with rose tones with ecru shaded plumage and flowers in shades of lilac combine to produce a most successful whole. This is the type of chintz suggested for living-room draperies. The width is fifty inches and the cost four dollars and a half a yard.

The Story of a Boy, a Dog and Another Dog

THE BAD PENNY

By MARGARET HILDA WISE

ILLUSTRATED BY MARY ESSEX

IF Ruffles had ever been exhibited in a dog-show, he would undoubtedly have carried off first prize in the Miscellaneous Class. He had never met a dog who looked quite like himself, but he did not worry about his appearance, except as far as Tom was concerned. And as he was quite perfect in Tom's eyes, all was right with the world.

When Ruffles first became a member of The Family, he was not much more than six months old. The Family chiefly became aware of his presence through the excellent work of his sharp, white teeth. One morning's work in particular caused the thunders of Jove to rumble ominously, and Tom was given a certain short length of time in which to get Ruffles interested in other sources of amusement than clothes on the line, shoes and rubbers, Polly's Teddy Bear, and countless other handy articles. Otherwise, Ruffles, in spite of his sweet disposition and his pleading brown eyes, was to be numbered with The Family no longer.

The result of this edict was two fold; Ruffles continued to dwell under the same roof, and his allegiance, from then on, was sworn, primarily, to Tom, whom he regarded as a very-much-to-be-loved young god. The others he loved, too, but Tom was the pivot round which his doggie world moved, and to please Tom seemed to Ruffles the highest achievement any dog could strive for. He had been everybody's dog at first, acquired chiefly, perhaps for a companion for six-year-old Polly, but belonging actually to none of The Family in particular. But Polly, from the first, did not interest Ruffles; he was still too much of a baby himself to put up with being bothered by human ones. He objected strenuously to having his ears pulled, or his absurd stump of a tail, so he avoided Polly wherever possible, for, being of a gentle nature, he did not want to snap at her, but there is a limit to any dog's patience!

It was Eleanor who named him Ruffles the very first time she saw him, with his untidy, shaggy coat hanging in disorder all over his sturdy body and absurd legs, and flapping half over his eyes, like a sheep-dog, which breed Ruffles quite largely was. Eleanor was Tom's grown-up sister; she became very fond of Ruffles from the time he first appeared. Later on, to be sure, she almost forgot Ruffles, as she did most other things, so absorbed she became in the attentions of a certain young man. But that is another story.

Ruffles celebrated his first spring by having distemper rather badly, and it was then proved how much of a hold, even so far, he had managed to attain in the hearts of The Family. For it was Aunt Mary who administered the necessary medicines when Tom was at school; and Father who dressed in the middle of one night, at a scared-faced appeal from Tom, and went in the car to fetch the Vet, as Ruffles appeared very low. Eleanor offered her services as nurse, and Tom found her useful, and accepted her help gratefully. Judy, his flapper sister, was rather inclined to dismiss the case as a whole lot of fuss over a dog who would get well anyway, but when, once or twice, Ruffles seemed to have to put up a good fight to keep on living, she relented and consented to run errands for the comfort of the four-footed invalid. Even Polly contributed her mite towards easing his suffering, by surrounding him with all her dolls and animal toys "for poor, poor Ruffles to play with," she said, until Aunt Mary removed them for hygienic reasons, explaining that Ruffles was too tired to play. As for Tom, all the time he could spare from the business of being educated, and a little more besides, was spent with his sick friend, coaxing him to take what food the doctor prescribed, pleading with him to swallow his medicines, and when Ruffles seemed on the point of giving up the struggle, keeping the spark alive in him by calling his name continually in as soft a voice as he could muster, and talking to him in a language peculiar to these two. Tom was not at all ashamed of the few tears he shed secretly at this time; and in return, Ruffles once in a while feebly wagged his despondent tail, and his eyes, so full of pent-up misery, followed Tom wherever he moved within his range of vision.

Ruffles emerged from this ordeal a dignified and more responsible dog. He assumed the role of watch-dog, and barked regularly at the milkman, the butcher-boy and others who came daily to the house, until he was persuaded to distinguish between them and the old Jew junk dealers who pestered the neighborhood. He cultivated a tremendous friendship with the cook. She, good old soul, recognized his ulterior motive in this, but was fond of him, nevertheless, and kept a never-failing supply of bones and tid-bits on hand for him. His greatest difficulty, which he could never quite overcome, was the question of the rugs and the polished floors. It was so delightful to rush down the stairs, or fly the length of the hall, or through the door of a room, and slide the last few feet on one of the rugs which lay about all over the house, conveniently for such a purpose. Owing to this, Ruffles was in almost continual disgrace with Aunt Mary, who kept house ever since the mother of The Family had died. She always demanded an apology from Ruffles, and with flattened ears and humble eyes he would promise to be a model dog—till next time.

Later on, to be sure, she almost forgot Ruffles, as she did most other things, so absorbed she became in the attentions of a certain young man.

Saturday was to Ruffles Day of Days, for it was Tom's day, and manifold were its joys. Tom, being the only boy in The Family, with three sisters, was a little stranded at home for comradeship, which drew him closer to Ruffles. Sisters were mostly a nuisance—Eleanor, too busy with beaux; Judy, too occupied with putting her hair up; and not doing anything undignified; and Polly, too tiny and frail. But Ruffles was always on the spot, after breakfast on Saturdays, his tail wagging wildly, his eyes bright with expectancy, and his mouth wearing a broad grin, with a pink tongue hanging out in excitement. Ruffles was not afraid of soiling his clothes, or of getting his feet wet, or of being late home to lunch; in fact, the muddier his feet, or the more completely his coat was matted with burrs, twigs and dead leaves, the happier he was in spirit. Tom thanked his stars that Ruffles was not another sister, and took him off on all-day hikes as if he were a school-boy colleague. Sometimes they took bacon and eggs and bread in a knapsack, built a fire somewhere in the heart of the country, and cooked their own lunch, Ruffles business being to fetch sticks for the fire, and to eat half of what was cooked. At other times they halted at a farmhouse at noon, and Tom would ask to be allowed some of the dinner for himself and his dog, paying a small amount for it out of his pocket-money. On one occasion, however, Ruffles, who was usually a peaceable dog, was provoked into a fight with a farm dog, and the farmer having declared that his dog was too badly damaged for anything but the hands of the Veterinary, Tom had to pay the fee, and go on his way with nothing but crestfallen Ruffles trotting behind him.

"You funny boy," Aunt Mary used to say, "I don't see what you find to amuse you so, going off every single Saturday with that dog."

Tom was almost always spared the necessity of replying, for his father usually said:

"Now, Mary, don't tell me you've forgotten how your dog used to insist upon going with Charlie and me when we went out for tramps after school, and you used to weep and say you wished you were a boy so that Ted would go walking with you instead of us."

To which Aunt Mary invariably replied: "Yes, yes! Tom is so like you were then."

Nobody ever quite saw the connection in this remark, but it didn't make much difference.

SUNDAY was somewhat less fun for Ruffles, for it was celebrated soberly by The Family, and Aunt Mary insisted upon church, morning and evening. Since this included Tom, Ruffles would most cheerfully have attended both services also, had it not been that Aunt Mary had also, from the very first, thought of this, and therefore saw to it before starting-time, that Ruffles was shut into the nursery on the top floor with Polly, who was too young to go. There were a few occasions when Ruffles arranged matters so that he was missing at the crucial moment, and was later discovered padding softly after The Family with a face expressive of absolute innocence; and his own beloved Tom was sent post haste to shut him up at home, though the scolding which should have accompanied this never seemed to be forthcoming. Usually, however, Tom, feeling down-hearted and uncomfortable in his Sunday spruceness would look back at the nursery window as he departed unwillingly with The Family, and would always see a shaggy head turned wistfully after him down the street. At such times, Tom wished for a fairy or something equally gifted to change him for Sundays only into the guise of Polly. Judy and Eleanor occasionally managed to plead headaches and stay home, but Tom ordinarily, hardly ever had such a thing, and Aunt Mary's prescription for his Sunday ailments was that the good, brisk walk to church would do him much more good than sitting moping at home. Moping, indeed!

Monday was proverbially blue for Ruffles. It was the beginning of five days wherein a dog must amuse himself somehow, be most polite to The Family, and see Tom only for a few hours out

Dishes Where Nuts Give the Final Touch from Soup to Ice Cream

On the right (top) is seen bouillon with a dash of nuts; to the left is a dish of curried nuts with rice; to the left (lower) is a plateful of cocoanut macaroons; in the centre is a dish of ice cream, and to the right a dish of nut cookies.

NUT NOVELTIES

By MARY M. NEIL

NUTS should be used more in cookery than they generally are, as they rank high as brain and nerve foods, thus furnishing a valuable addition to the limited range of vegetarian dietary.

Nuts must be eaten with salt to assist in their digestion, then if thoroughly masticated, they may be eaten raw by almost anyone. When cooked they often give the needed touch to a pudding or other dessert, while nearly any salad is enhanced by their presence. They may be used freely in layer cake fillings and for the school luncheon basket they are indispensable as they make tempting sandwich fillings with cheese, and fresh and dried fruits.

Delicious Nut Soup.—Wash and peel one pound of potatoes, cut them in slices and peel and slice one onion. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add the potatoes, the onion, and stir and cook for five minutes, taking care that they do not brown, then add four cupfuls of water, one teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of pepper. When this comes to the boil skim it, and allow to simmer until the vegetables are tender. Rub the soup through a sieve, return it to the saucepan, add two cupfuls of milk, and when it comes to the boil add one cupful of finely chopped nut meats, boil for fifteen minutes longer and serve hot. Garnish with a spoonful of whipped cream and chopped nut meats.

Appetizing Curried Nuts.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add one chopped apple and one chopped onion, and fry them slowly until a light brown color. Then mix in one teaspoonful of curry powder or curry paste, one and one-half cupfuls of chopped nut meats, one-half cupful of stock or water, one-half teaspoonful of salt and cook for twenty minutes. Serve with a border of plain boiled rice and garnish with quarters of tomatoes, or slices of hard cooked eggs.

Cocoanut Macaroons.—Put one pound of chopped cocoanut into a bowl, add one white of egg, one can of condensed milk, a pinch of salt and one-fourth teaspoonful of almond extract. Beat well with a wooden spoon and drop from the spoon on to a greased baking tin, and bake in a slow oven until firm to the touch. Keep in airtight box.

Nut Cookies.—Beat one-half cupful of butter with one-half cupful of grated maple sugar and one-fourth cupful of white sugar. Stir in one egg that has been well beaten, one tablespoonful of water, one and three-fourths cupfuls of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking powder, one-eighth teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of powdered nutmeg. Add one-half cupful of chopped nut meats, beat well, turn out on to a floured baking board, roll out the dough and cut it into cookies. Lay on greased tins and bake in a moderate oven. When cool, put together with jam or jelly and cover with frosting. Decorate each cookie with half of a walnut meat.

Nut Ice Cream.—Mix one cupful of milk with three cupfuls of whipped cream, add three-fourths cupful of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful each of vanilla extract and lemon extract, and one-half cupful each of chopped walnut meats, almonds, and filberts. Freeze and serve in glasses with whipped and sweetened cream, and decorate with chopped cocoanut and preserved cherries.

Walnut Mould.—Mix two tablespoonfuls of cooked rice with three tablespoonfuls of chopped nut meats, one tablespoonful of bread crumbs, one beaten egg, a pinch of powdered mace, one teaspoonful of lemon juice, pepper, paprika and salt to taste. The mixture should be firm, but not too dry. Pack it into a well greased mould, cover with a buttered paper, and steam steadily for one and one-half hours. Turn out and serve hot with tomato sauce.

Nut Muffins.—Beat together one and one-half cupfuls of flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one egg for five minutes, then add two cupfuls of rolled roasted peanuts, and bake in hot buttered gem pans. Sprinkle some nuts on the top before baking.

Nut Cake.—Cream one-half cupful of butter with three tablespoonfuls of sugar, then add the yolks of two eggs well beaten with a little water, add eight tablespoonfuls of flour mixed with one teaspoonful of baking powder, then add two tablespoonfuls of chopped walnut meats, one tablespoonful of chopped almonds and one-half teaspoonful of orange extract. Mix well and bake in a flat buttered and floured cake tin in a moderate oven until a golden color. Heat four tablespoonfuls of milk, four tablespoonfuls of cream, three tablespoonfuls of sugar with three yolks of eggs. When this is quite hot (but not boiling), lift the pan from the fire and stir in the stiffly beaten whites of the three eggs and four tablespoonfuls of chopped nut meats. Cover the cake evenly with this mixture, then put in the oven until set.

Were you an Ivory Soap baby?

What Ivory Soap does for the baby's skin, it continues to do for that of the man or woman.

Ivory Soap cleanses gently. It contains nothing that can make the skin smart or burn, coarsen its texture, or leave it dry and rough. The mildness and purity that make it essential in the nursery, make it equally desirable for you.

Ivory Soap rinses perfectly. It leaves no soapy sediment to clog the pores and pave the way for blemishes and other skin troubles. Used daily, as it is used for a baby, it helps to keep the skin at its best.

Morning—Night

The finest dish is a Bubble Grain

Puffed Grains hold supreme place among cereal dainties—as food delights and as scientific foods.

None can imagine cereals more enticing. Here are airy, toasted bubbles—grains flimsy and flavory, puffed to eight times normal size. As fragile as snowflakes—as delicious as toasted nuts.

Millions of children revel in them, morning, noon and night. Sometimes with cream and sugar, sometimes with melted butter, sometimes in a fruit dish, sometimes in bowls of milk.

Prof. Anderson's ideal foods

But Puffed Grains are not mere delights. A scientist invented them for hygienic reasons.

One is whole wheat with every food cell blasted, so digestion is easy and complete. One is whole rice.

The grains are sealed in guns. An hour of fearful heat is then applied. Then the guns are shot, the steam explodes—every food cell is broken.

Thus Puffed Wheat yields whole-wheat nutrition. All elements are utilized. Ordinary cooking at its best leaves most food cells unbroken.

Mothers who ponder these facts are more and more serving grain foods in this ideal form.

Serve these toasted whole wheat bubbles in every bowl of milk of each twenty-four. Undoubtedly Ruffles learned to count the days till Saturday came round again. It was, however, on a Saturday that the Affliction arrived. Ruffles objected to nothing so much as tiny dogs who in any way resembled squirrels or cats. And the Affliction was a Pekinese.

Ruffles was most disconcerted to come in at the end of a particularly happy and successful hike to find The Family going into raptures over a little Chinese lap-dog which any real dog would scorn to notice. He was yellow, and his hair was long and silky—no good for hiking—and he ran around the floor on silly, short legs that were almost as good as none. Moreover, his feathery tail curled over his back in the most objectionable manner, thought poor Ruffles, whose own tail was scarcely long enough to tuck between his legs when he was in disgrace.

Ruffles had hardly appeared in the room, behind Tom, when there rose an agitated cry from Aunt Mary.

"Oh, Tom! Hold Ruffles a moment, there's a good boy, whilst I pick Chong up. Ruffles is such a big, clumsy brute, he could squash the poor little fellow with one paw."

She dived after Chong, who, scenting Ruffles' arrival on the scene, scuttled away from her and through some intervening chairs. Tom knew better than to hold Ruffles. If the dogs were to meet at all peaceably, it would be far better for both to be free. Aunt Mary, of course, was furious, and the girls stood with bated breath, hardly daring to squeak, while Chong minced up to the disgusted Ruffles, and Tom stood motionless to wait results.

Nothing disastrous happened, for Ruffles rather scorned to interest himself in what looked like one of Polly's toys come to life. After a moment, everybody breathed a great sigh of relief, all except Tom, who asked, as Ruffles walked stiff-legged and with tremendous dignity, out of the room.

"Is that little beast going to live here?"

Aunt Mary seated herself gravely, and looked at her nephew with displeasure.

"He is," she replied, "and I am sorry to hear you call a poor harmless little creature such a name."

Tom's face was unrepentant.

"Who's responsible for bringing him here?" he demanded. "You, I suppose, Judy. You never did like Ruffles."

Then Eleanor confessed to be the rightful owner and proud possessor of Chong.

"George has given him to me for an engagement present," she said gently to Tom, "and he really is a pet—Chong, I mean."

She crossed the room to her brother and put an arm affectionately round his shoulders.

"Promise me you'll like him, and make Ruffles, Tommy dear," she pleaded.

"How do I know what Ruffles will think of him?" inquired Tom, non-committally, and defiant for his rugged friend.

"And Chong has a pedigree simply miles long," continued his sister.

Then Tom did a very rude thing. He flung himself away from her, and out of the room, saying with great emphasis,

"Aw, gee! You make me sick!"

It was a consolation to Ruffles to find that Chong was equally unwelcome to his beloved young master.

And the reason Ruffles was so polite to Chong for a week or so after his arrival was only due to the fact that instinct warned him to be very careful in his dealings with the little Pekinese, or more dire consequences might result not only for himself, but Tom, also. He knew that The Family watched him with suspicion, whenever he was near Chong, as if they expected him any moment to pounce on his rival and shake him till there was nothing left. As a matter of fact, Ruffles would have given a whole year's supply of bones to have been in a position to do something very like that, but at first his discretion overcame this great temptation which beset him.

In the meantime, he noted with a sinking heart that the advent of the Affliction was causing him to be unpopular with Aunt Mary. And he had noted that in the house her word was law, so that if she were ever to say, "Ruffles must go. . . ." His behaviour, it seemed, contrasted most unfavorably with that of the newcomer. Chong was never known to scramble rugs into a heap, or to leave large muddy paw-marks on the polished floors, or to plant an affectionate chin with a beard bristling with sticks and dead leaves on Aunt Mary's lap. Ruffles' good habits were quite lost sight of; the fact that he never jumped up on beds or furniture, and always lay quietly under the table during meals—with his head convenient to Tom's hand when it should slip unobtrusively under the tablecloth with a morsel. Ruffles, too, began to feel keenly the lack of a pedigree. It seemed to be handicapping him greatly, for so many privileges seemed to accrue to the possession of one. He noticed for instance, that Chong was allowed to run around freely during meals, bothering each member of The Family in turn for attention and food. It was this which ultimately wrought the mischief. Also Ruffles saw Chong many times, sleeping unchidden upon the snowy counterpanes of The Family's beds, including Aunt Mary's own. This called forth a protest from Tom.

"It isn't fair when you won't let Ruffles," he said, and kept the door of his room carefully closed, so that his domain, at least, should be kept sacred to Ruffles' nightly use.

Aunt Mary smiled at Tom's childish jealousy, and Eleanor became quite annoyed with her brother over his stubborn refusal to love her dog. Her father was too occupied with business problems to notice the growing unrest concerning the two dogs, until one day it was brought forcibly to his attention.

It was during dinner, and Chong had, as usual, been scampering around the table in his never-ending quest for tid-bits. He always included Tom in his efforts, but so far he had been unsuccessful, for any stray morsels from Tom's plate were consecrated to a certain mouth under the table, and no other. This evening, however, Tom became rather tired of having Chong appear, panting, at his elbow every minute or so, and, in an effort to send him away for a while, he gave him a piece of bread. It had hardly disappeared down Chong's throat, when there was a rush from under the table, following by shrill and terrified kiy-ing. Everybody sprang up at once, but it was Tom who made Ruffles let go, and Chong flew yelping to his mistress to be comforted. The Family sat down again in ominous silence. Tom's eyes were on his plate, and his face and ears were crimson with rage at his own stupidity, with indignation

Follow these directions

Comb your hair over your face, freeing it from tangles. Wet thoroughly, for the wetter your hair the more profuse the lather.

Dip your fingers into the shampoo (previously poured into a cup or glass) and massage it into the scalp. You will find a profuse, fragrant lather follows your fingers, which soon envelops your head like a cap.

This lather penetrates roots and hair cells, dislodging dandruff and dissolving dirt and oil accumulations.

Wash the length in this thick lather and then begin rinsing. This is easy, as water dissolves Palmolive Shampoo instantly without any danger of leaving soap traces. Use two or three waters, or, far better, use a bath spray. Let the final rinsing be cold.

Two lathers are required—the trial bottle contains ample quantity. Then dry by fanning and shaking.

Brush thoroughly (with a clean brush) and then examine the quality of your hair.

Its softness, its silky abundance, its shiny, attractive gloss, will delight you.

Olive Oil Makes Glossy Hair

SILKY texture and satiny gloss are attractions you need not envy. You can acquire these qualities very easily. Stop the careless washing, which makes your hair rough, dull and brittle, and use Palmolive Shampoo, which cleanses more thoroughly without drying out the hair.

After a Palmolive Shampoo your hair is beautifully soft. It is silky and it has that well-groomed look. Brush it carefully, massage it gently once a day and shampoo every two weeks, and everyone will admire your glorious, glossy hair.

Used by scalp specialists

Palmolive Shampoo is rich in olive oil, the great hair beautifier used by scalp specialists to revitalize thin, lifeless, falling, unhealthy hair.

It gives the all-desired gloss and a beautiful, silky quality. It keeps your hair soft and makes it seem abundant.

This olive oil is blended with palm oil, another Oriental oil of beneficial action, and coconut oil is added for the sake of its lathering qualities.

Send for trial-size bottle

It is sent absolutely free, accompanied by a booklet which explains home treatment of the hair and scalp to help make it grow thick and beautiful.

Acquaintance bottle and book together introduce you to the secret of glorious, glossy hair, beautiful with health and the well-groomed look women envy and men admire.

Fabrics and Colors Which Make the Spring Wardrobe Radiant

Pretty Springtime Frocks and Smart Separate Skirts

Navy blue charmeuse and cream filet net have combined their charm in this afternoon model, which vouches for the puffed sleeve and long side panels dipping below the hem.

and the beach skirt, is that the latter, which is a little above knee-length, makes a much prettier picture than the street skirt which is anywhere from two to three inches below the knee, and shows about the same amount of stocking—sometimes a very filmy stocking—between its hem and the top of the spat or boot. We saw a very ugly example of this the other day. A smart young thing stood in front of a full length mirror in a fashionable hotel tittivating. She wore a short tube skirt, the back of which, as she stood there, caught in the hollow back of her knee, and there it stuck. An inch or two longer, and it would have hung straight and would have been really graceful.

When womenkind, young and old, slender and otherwise, discard the absurd brevity which has no claim to the really artistic effect in dress—and that is what Fashion should always aim at—they will appear much better dressed. Many have adhered to a reasonable length, and when they have, the general style of skirts has never been prettier or more sensible than at the present time. One can't conceive women of to-day, with their energy and progressiveness ever going back to the trailing drapery, such as they wore even a few years ago. Just refer to the family photographs, your snapshot album, or the fashion papers of that short time ago and see for yourself.

There's a happy medium for skirt lengths as for everything else. Let's insist upon it.

The separate skirts, which it is decreed we shall wear this spring, are particularly pleasing. They are made of soft velvety surfaced woollens, woven in stripes or plaids, cut straight and laid in pleats. Many of them have pockets, and one looks at the ingenious way these slashed pockets are inserted and marvels at the art of the tailor. This is one type of fashionable skirt. The other is cut in circular fashion, or if this be too extreme, in two pieces with gored sides. It is very trig and just the thing for street wear on any occasion, and Tweed mixtures, very smart home-spuns and small two-tone check fabrics are used for them.

The complement of these skirts is a tailored shirt. Heavy crepe de Chine or habutai tucked and high collared are ideal for early spring wear and for summer, when we shall also return to our old love, fine voile with Valenciennes or filet lace edging. Before leaving the interesting topic of skirts, perhaps we should mention the fact that cream flannel, serge, jersey and tricotine skirts are in vogue again, and we think will be worn by a great many smart women this spring. Cream woollen suits are also a thing of the present season.

The dresses illustrated on this page are typical of a season when supple weaves vie with crisp taffetas and organdies. The latter, are of course reserved for summer, but one must think of summer things even as early as this if one is to be ready for June weddings and the first garden fete. And just let me say that incongruous as it may appear to combine cotton and silk, verily it is done in the best wardrobes; organdie, the queen of cotton textiles, is allied with taffeta in charming frocks for the summer wardrobe. For instance, we saw an alluring grey organdie with ruffles of itself made up over a black taffeta slip. But more of organdie on some near future occasion!

YOU who follow Fashion's footsteps must be prepared to wear lace. It is the vogue. Not just black and white laces, but lace dyed in all the shades of the season—grey, brown, blue, henna, and other tones. The model which we illustrate happens to be of the more conservative type, and is of cream filet over navy blue charmeuse, and to our way of regarding design, is rather a triumph. The low waist line is identical with the season's most approved mode. The large flowing cuff or puff at the elbow, is rather a happy idea. Many women who would like to wear short sleeves, especially in summer, hesitate to do so, because so few have pretty elbows. This enveloping cuff takes in the elbow and all's well. The pleated side panels that dip below the hem are a concession that Fashion makes to those who like moderately short skirts, yet are a little doubtful as to whether they should wear them or not. If skirts were worn ankle-length, this practice of dropping one section of the skirt below the other would never do at all.

This maiden is modern to the last detail, even the way she holds her hands and the brown marocain crepe of her frock and its lightening garniture, in Chinese orange.

The vampish-looking young person in the illustration at the centre of the page does a great injustice to the fetching frock she is wearing, but that is the artist's doing. He has made her hold her hands in just that impressionistic way to show off the corsage with its little finger pockets—goodness knows what else they hold—and again the low waist line which asserts itself in nine-tenths of the season's models. But the really clever feature of this frock, we think, is the skirt drapery, which shows the embroidery in lightening design, beneath its folds and on the corners that fall below the hem. You will observe also, that instead of having the design embroidered on the front of the corsage, the decoration is on the shoulders, suggesting a yoke. The material of which it is made is brown marocain crepe with deep orange embroidery—a combination, that is very popular, in spite of the fact that brown is usually supposed to be a fall color.

THE other illustration is as sweet and modest a thing as one could imagine. Anybody's sister, sweetheart or daughter might be wearing it. That's the charm of this season's frocks. There's a type for everyone. No such thing as suppressing individuality if one wants to express it.

The material is crepe de Chine, but Canton crepe or taffeta might very well be substituted if for any reason it should happen to be advisable. Isn't the plain little bodice and the quaint puffing irresistible?

For young and old there is nothing more becoming than panels, and incidentally, there's nothing much more fashionable this season. We saw some wonderful beautiful models made by a Canadian manufacturer in what is commonly known as coat dress style, with coat of navy blue tricotine over a black satin slip. The skirt of the coat was slashed so as to form long, loose panels which were as gorgeous, with colored bead and silk floss embroidery, as the moccasins of an Indian princess. The light colored tricotines, such as beige and aluminum grey are not combined with any other material, unless as facings or pipings, but they are quite as gorgeously embellished with embroidery.

Color means so much in our everyday lives, that it is always of interest to know what are to be the dominating tones of a season's wardrobe, whether it is to be a case of accepting them just as they are, or adapting them to suit our temperament and complexion, and incidentally, the remains of last season's wardrobe. This season we have neutral tones and riotously gay ones side by side for our choosing. Like a demure little grey lady out of an old romance, comes the most fashionable color of the season, silver grey, also.

Silvery, shimmering grey crepe de Chine asks no odds of any other shade or material when it resolves itself into a frock of this kind.

Pretty Springtime Frocks

called squirrel and aluminum grey. Its very neutrality, many contend, makes it trying to the complexion that has passed its first blush of beauty. But if this objection be well taken, there are combinations of navy blue and black that one will do well to consider. Grey and black do not suggest mourning, as one might suppose, but quite the contrary of some of the models we have seen. A sash of Chinese orange blends beautifully with silver grey in an evening costume. We hear that black taffeta is to be very fashionable for afternoon frocks, also brown with oriole as panels, facings and sashes. Oriole or Chinese orange is a very sprightly shade with a strong appeal for the youthful. Porcelain blue is another of the season's dress shades, and of course navy blue—was there ever a season when it didn't triumph?

No wardrobe, be it for summer or winter, is complete without a sweater coat—not merely one, but two or three or more. One knits them crochets them and buys them all ready to put on in the shops, where the styles for spring are irresistible.

Brushed alpaca which looks like angora is one of the very newest materials the season has to offer and one will find some very smart coats in this material, made entirely of the brushed material, or made of smooth finished alpaca and trimmed with the brushed variety. Some of the very best houses are showing these. Then, there is the chiffon alpaca. It has been aptly named. One at once pictures a coat very light in weight, in fact quite transparent, made of a fleecy wool, to be worn with a light summer skirt. It too, is to be found in the tuxedo style, and black, white, henna, French blue, jade and grey are shades to conjure with in a coat of this style. Someone was lucky enough to hit upon a new tuxedo coat, which, happily comes at quite a popular price, so that she, whose purse is none too elastic, may have one. It is just like any other tuxedo, only the peplum or skirt is abbreviated. It extends only a few inches below the waist line. The sleeves are just a little below the elbow and are knit to flare. They are shown in all the popular shades. Knitted capes and dresses are also to be had for summer wear.

EXERCISE.

By Gertrude Lewis

EMMY brought in an armful of wood for the fire. "My dear," said her husband, "you shouldn't do that."

She lifted the heavy case of berries to the table and sat down to look them over.

"I'd help you if I wasn't waiting for Bates to come over and look at the new filly."

The grocer's boy deposited a dollar's worth of sugar on the floor and Emmy took it up and put it in the sugar pail on the lower pantry shelf.

"You really shouldn't," said her husband.

Finally she lugged the iron preserve kettle to the sink for the last time and went out for another pail of water.

"I hate to see you lift so, Emmy. My, how many glasses have you got? It's my favorite jam. I'll get you a case of cherries to-morrow."

Emmy went on getting up a hearty supper.

"Seems as if you didn't eat much," commented her husband. "Don't you want to walk down with me to-night while I finish that rubber with Stetson? The exercise will do you good."

Dainty Gowns and Picturesque Blouses for the May Days

8801—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 4½ yards 36-inch gingham—¾ yard 40-inch bands for collar, vest, and bias fold at edge at belt—¾ yard rick-rack band for trimming—¾ yard narrow ribbon for trimming vest—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. A double collar, such as shown in this model, is one of the smartest features of the Spring mode. The skirt has a tuck a few inches above the hem. Long, plain sleeves fit closely around the wrists and are finished without cuffs.

8954—Ladies' One-piece Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 4½ yards 27-inch chambray—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The U-shaped neck-line, the edge of the elbow sleeves, and the narrow belt are finished with a blanket stitch in wool. The front of the waist is embroidered in design 11808. Trimming-bands are looped up below the narrow belt. The dress is very simple in line but the wool embroidery gives an unusual touch that is attractive.

THE EXTRA MONEY I MAKE IN MY LEISURE HOURS AT HOME

The Woman Who Afforded New Summer Clothes Without Touching "the Family Money"

By MURIEL DAVIES
Illustrations by F. M. McAnelly

"I JUST dread to have Spring come!" I cried petulantly. "I actually envy the trees. They can have fresh, new, leafy summer clothes without skimping and scraping. You don't realize how a woman feels, Peter Davies; it hurts her to have to wear the old, faded things year after year. You used to call me your 'butterfly.' That was easy—when papa was paying for my clothes. You shouldn't have married until you could make your wife happy—and give her the dainty, pretty things she loves! It isn't fair to ask a girl to—"

Then Peter went out, without closing the door very gently, and I threw myself on the couch for a good cry. I didn't blame him much, but I just had to get it out of my system.

All Winter I had put up with wearing my previous year's coat and shabby fur neck-piece, simply because there was no way to stretch Peter's income to cover another dollar of expense.

I had done this as cheerfully as I could, because the sacrifice was partly for our darling little Baby Anne, but when the days began to get warmer in March and the shops began to display their light, dainty frocks and hats, and all the smart, frilly night things that every woman loves, I felt as if I couldn't stand it any longer. The worst of it was that I didn't know how to sew for myself very well and my beautiful trousseau clothes of two years ago were quite worn out. They had gone to pieces "all at once," and nothing first, just as bubbles do when they burst.

After I had cried enough to relieve my feelings I sat up and said to myself:

"You can't blame it all on Peter. Don't be childish! It takes time for a doctor to get established. You knew it would when you married him, so stop being a fool and see if you can't do something to help."

Then I sat there and thought of all the things women do to make money, but I was cut off from nearly all of them on account of my Baby Anne, who was only a year old and couldn't be left alone.

Just then the bell rang, and when I went to the door there stood Katy O'Brien, the woman who came to help clean the house and wash windows every two weeks.

"I wasn't expecting you until next Saturday, Katy," I said, after she had come in.

"I know it ma'am," she said, "and since I can't come Saturday, nor no more at all, I thought I'd let ye know a bit before, so's ye could get somebody else to help ye."

"What, you're not coming any more?" I cried in disappointment. "Are you going to get married, Katy, or did your Uncle Terence in Ireland die and leave you a legacy?"

"Nayther one, ma'am. I have been married once—which was enough—and Uncle Terence is in health. I'm in business for mesilf!" she finished proudly.

"In business for yourself?" I exclaimed incredulously. "Why, what can you do, Katy?"

"Somethin' that pays me a lot better than scrubbin' and swabbin' windows. I read about it in one of those women's papers yersilf gave me," she informed me. "I carry on my business in my own room, like a lady like yersilf, and I git paid regular for my work every month. Sometimes it's been $25 and sometimes more. Now that I'm goin' to put in my whole time at it I'll be makin' my everlastin' fortune."

"But, Katy," I said, "I want to know all about it. I want to go into business, too, if I can do it right here at home. I've just had a good cry, because things are so expensive, and because the Doctor is having a struggle getting his practice established here in Engleale, and because I can't think of any way to help. Will you tell me how you make money, Katy?"

"Sure I will!" she agreed—and she did

"Where DID my 'Butterfly' get her wings?" he asked smilingly.

Then the good woman showed me a page in a magazine for that very month, and when I had read it, and heard her story of success at the very same work that was advertised, I knew that my money troubles were going to end.

I wrote to the concern without telling Peter anything about it, and later, when I had sent for and received the wonderful little machine and outfit that Katy had told me about, I kept it hidden in my closet when my husband was in the house.

Every day for several weeks, while he was in his office down town or out making his professional visits, I worked at "my own business" in spare time. Then I sent the work I had done to Toronto and in the return mail I got a substantial cheque for the socks I had sent them.

You should have seen Peter's face when he came home and found me wearing the pretty little house-dress I bought with the money!

"Where did my 'butterfly' get her new wings?" he asked smilingly.

"I made them," I told him.

"But I thought you didn't know how to—"

"I don't, dear," I said. "I made the money they cost."

Then I showed him the AUTO KNITTER, the wonderful little machine that had enabled me to really make money—right at home.

I told him the whole story—how I cried—and about how Katy had appeared—like Cinderella's fairy god mother—and how I had kept my Auto Knitting a secret in order to surprise him.

Then I showed him how this marvelous, but very simple, and easily worked little machine turns out fine seamless wool hosiery with almost magical speed. I had the Auto Knitter clamped to the table, and to show him how easy it all was, I made a sock on the machine so quickly that he was really amazed.

"And you say the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company buys the socks from you?" he asked.

"Yes," I said, "they guarantee to always take every pair I make—at a guaranteed price. And they pay the transportation charges on ten dozen pairs or over, besides sending me the yarn to replace the amount used for the socks I have sent them. So you see the yarn hasn't cost me anything since the first lot. I didn't really need to buy any yarn to start work, for a generous amount was given free with the Auto Knitter."

Peter was certainly astonished, and when he saw how easy and pleasant the work was he said he had no objection to my continuing it. So I kept on Auto Knitting, sending the socks I made to the Auto Knitter Company and getting my cheques back promptly for every shipment.

The result was that I didn't have to go without any of the summer things I needed for myself or the baby last summer, and the Auto Knitter again helped to solve the clothes problem the following Fall and Winter. All this without my being obliged to touch a cent of what I call "the family money"—the money that Peter makes from his growing practice. He is succeeding much better now, but I still use the Auto Knitter regularly—sometimes making socks to send to Toronto, sometimes making them to sell to friends who have seen the strong, warm, long-wearing Auto Knitter Hosiery and want some of it; and sometimes to make warm little knitted things for Baby Anne.

Whenever I hear a woman complaining about the high cost of living and clothes, I always try to tell her how the Auto Knitter will help her to make money at home in spare time. I tell her why the Auto Knitter Company, an old, firmly established Canadian corporation, prefers socks of home manufacture. I explain how their wide business connections give them an enormous market for the good, honest, old-time wool socks made on the Auto Knitters of their home workers. Then I tell her, just as I am telling you, that the Auto Knitter Company will make a contract with every worker to pay her a liberal, guaranteed wage, on a piece-work basis.

This contract leaves you perfectly free—you can work for them as much as you want, or as little—spare time or full time—or not at all—yet for every shipment of socks you send them you get your pay cheque—promptly.

You are, of course, at liberty to dispose of the outfit of your Auto Knitter as you see fit; you can also use the Auto Knitter to make, at a remarkably low cost, all the hosiery your family needs.

But remember this: There are absolutely no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight out-and-out employment offer at a Fixed Wage on a piece-work basis—a good pay for your services alone.

No matter where you live I feel sure that you want to know all about the machine that has meant so much to me. By all means write to the Auto Knitter Company at once and find out about the pleasant and profitable occupation waiting for you—Auto Knitting. Find out what substantial amounts even a small part of your spare time will earn for you.

Remember that experience is unnecessary; that you do not need to know how to knit. The Auto Knitter does the work.

I can never be thankful enough that I didn't put off writing for information about it on that March morning, when I cried, and Katy appeared with news of the Auto Knitter.

You will never regret writing for it, either. Send your name and address now, and find out all the good things that are in store for you. The Auto Knitter Hosiery (Canada) Company, Limited, Dept. 1354-K, 1870 Davenport Road, Toronto, Ont.

Smart Costumes and Dainty Blouses for Spring Afternoons

PATTERNS AND PRICES.

9102—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 38 bust. Size 36 requires 2½ yards 36-inch crepe de Chine. The front is embroidered in design 12570. The Tuxedo collar is rounded off at the lower edge, just above the waistline.

9291—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Size 36 requires 2½ yards 36-inch wash silk.

9373—Ladies' Jacket. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Length at center-back 30½ inches. No. 8416—Ladies' Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1¾ yard. The suit in medium size requires 3¼ yards 54-inch tricotline—2½ yards 36-inch foulard for lining.

8603—Ladies' Overblouse. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. No. 9390—Ladies' Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1¾ yard. The costume in medium size requires 7 yards 36-inch satin—¾ yard 36-inch lining. The pointed tunic is beaded in design 12601.

9356—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 36 requires 4¾ yards 40-inch Georgette crêpe—5½ yards 40-inch white Georgette crêpe for vest and collar—¾ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. This is a particularly good style for women of full figure as the long lines of the vest and tunic give an effect of slenderness. There are many materials for which this model is suitable besides the Georgette crêpe in which it is illustrated. Among these may be mentioned Canton and Moroccan crêpe, charmeuse, foulard, crêpe de Chine, taffeta, serge, and Poirer twill. Indeed the choice is so wide that the dress may be used for Summer days and for early Spring wear. It is appropriate also for less dressy service fashioned of linen, gingham, or chambray.

9336—Ladies Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Size 36 requires 2 yards 36-inch voile—2½ yards entre-deux to trim collar and sleeves. The edge of the collar and the sleeves may be trimmed with tiny flat crocheted buttons.

9316—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Size 36 requires 1¾ yard 40-inch organdy. The open neck is finished with a round collar, pointed in front.

Advancing years first evidence themselves in the lines of the figure; little accumulations of flesh that destroy the symmetry of youth. To the comfortable persuasion of a Gossard the prominent hips, the fleshy back or the too-short waistline of maturity blend into the natural grace of those ideal proportions that "beautify and youthify"

Unfortunately, youth is not eternal; and the grace and beauty of maturity must depend largely upon the proper care of the figure in early years. Gossard artistry has fashioned the softest and most pliable of corsets to round the slim beauty of youth with a hygienic support that safeguards the wearer against the unfortunate figure tendencies of middle life.

Obvious striving for effect defeats its own purpose.

Particularly is this true as regards dress. The artificial devotee of fashion is not comparable with the woman who has learned that beauty often disguises itself in naturalness and simplicity.

This sense of fitness, of the feeling for right proportions and the harmony between details, is one of the truest guides to the successful selection of a corset. Study yourself and be mindful that violent contrast between waist and hips and bust, not only makes becoming dress impossible, but violates that charm of mystery that proper corsetry enhances.

The true art of Gossard Corsetry lies in its comprehensive understanding of the Eva Olney Farnsworth has written in reference to becoming dress for the woman of full figure, "The more the waist is compressed and the tighter the dress appears to fit, the more the stoutness will be revealed". The self-effacing support of a slenderizing Gossard Corset that recognizes proportion and grace of line as fundamentals of true beauty, gives the charm of natural grace to the stoutest figure.

have attained an unquestioned prestige that it is our pride to guard jealously by making each and every Gossard as perfect as true artistry, fine workmanship and the highest grade materials can make it. This pride of leadership is your best assurance that every Gossard Corset offers you the true economy of unequalled value.

Though of superior quality, these original front lacing corsets are priced within the reach of every woman. You will find them only at the best stores, where skillful corsetiers will assume full responsibility for your complete satisfaction.

intimate needs of every type of figure. Recognizing as many types of beauty as there are types of women, this gracious artistry fashions models for each that accentuate the natural beauty of the figure, while veiling its disharmonies with a comforting, healthful support that modestly hides behind the beauty it creates.

Correctly poised and moving without conscious effort, you will marvel at those Gossards that seem to have been created for you alone. And as months pass you will realize the true economy of buying a corset of unparalleled quality, for a Gossard will retain its original grace of line far beyond the life of the average corset. Its superior wearing service alone is worth its cost.

Modes and Fabrics

GREYER and greyer grow the gowns:—but not a dull or leaden grey,—everything from a silver mist to a blue-grey moon-light. There is a symphony of grey played by the gowns in the shop-windows and this color, neutral but always soothing, forms an effective background for the delicate tints of early spring.

Necks are high or low, or both as in the new waistcoat blouses with strap-like collars that can button up under the chin or be worn open over the collar of a tailored jacket. The collarless neck is used a good deal in dresses that are to be worn under capes or coats or with a fur neck-piece, and its desirability under these conditions is easy to see. A collar high in the back and open in the front is really newer and is much more becoming to most women.

There has been very little change in sleeves since last season. The wide peasant sleeve is still the most popular for day dresses and the new box coats. The long plain sleeve is used for tailored coats and the more severe type of street dress and the very short sleeve for the afternoon. Puff sleeves with the puff above the elbow are newer than the extremely short sleeve.

Spring wedding-dresses are apt to be less elegant than those for weddings earlier in the year, though for a large church wedding the dress may be of brocade, silver cloth, satin or silk crepe. For a simpler wedding there is nothing as lovely as tulle. Georgette is very satisfactory too, and also crepe de Chine. The tulle veil is as long as the dress or train. Lace should not be cut and is not likely to be too long. Any evening dress with a half sleeve and modified decolletage or any formal afternoon dress is suitable for a wedding gown.

Silks are used to-day far more generally than they ever were before, since they are now no more expensive than wool materials and are more comfortable as the days grow warmer, says "The Delineator." The smartest afternoon costume of the Spring is the silk dress and cape en suite, a black, dark-blue or dark-brown silk frock with a cape of the same material and color. The silk is usually one of the crepes, the new Canton or Marocain crepes or the finer-grained crepe de Chine.

A SPRING-LIKE SATIN CREATION

In this charming chemise dress of Moon-Glo Satin the grace of the long line is exemplified and enhanced by panels of embroidery which fall to the bottom of the straight skirt and end in silk tassels. A low belt of narrow satin tied in a soft bow at the side gives the last touch of smartness.

IS BOVRIL GOOD FOR A BABY?

SO many questions have been asked lately of the Family Physician about food for children that he is thinking of preparing a short series of talks for this Department on that one most important question. But meantime one of the subscribers to the Canadian Home Journal has asked us a fair question and she must have a fair answer.

There are things that are much better for a baby than Bovril. This particular baby is a little girl about eighteen months old. The one indispensable food for babies and children is MILK. Don't ever forget that! They cannot grow well without milk. They do not thrive without milk. Milk is our greatest protective food. As Mr. Herbert Hoover says, the White Race cannot survive without Dairy Products.

Milk is the most important food for the Mother too. It is indispensable for the Nursing Mother. Milk in different forms is an absolutely necessary food to us all. Whoever would try to cook without milk? Why, no one. But you do not use it in cooking as much as you would if you thought about it more. Skim milk in cooking is excellent. (Of course you have bread and butter on the table. The butter is your cream.) Rice cooked properly in skimmed milk is food fit for a king. Add a little jam or brown sugar, to sprinkle over the top, and any child, almost, will eat it with pleasure.

Milk, even if it costs sixteen cents or more a quart, is still our cheapest food, when you consider the amount of nourishment you get for that sixteen cents. For that sixteen cents paid for a quart of milk, you get as much nourishment as from about a pound of lean beef. So milk is cheaper than beef. For that sixteen cents, paid for a quart of milk, you get as much nourishment as you get from ten eggs. So milk is cheaper than eggs. For that sixteen cents, you get as much nourishment as you would from three-and-three-quarter pounds of fresh fish. So milk is cheaper than fish.

Give the babies and children milk, and use it in cooking and take it yourself. Milk is not a drink, it is an essential article of food.

"Well, but," you say in reply, "I give the baby all the milk she will take." Dear reader, when are you going to remember that the baby has a mind? And that the baby of eighteen months has quite a mature mind, compared with the mind she had eighteen months ago.

If she will only take a little milk, or if she does not like milk, there is some reason for it. Either she does not like the color of her cup or the color of her milk, or the taste of it, or you have not interested her in her food, or something else is her reason for not taking milk. She has a reason. So we must dilute the milk with hot water, or add a little salt. (Perhaps it is the salt in it that makes her like the Bovril).

When she was nine months old and you began to wean her, you used to put a little sugar in the milk. Did you abruptly leave it out? Try it again. A little sugar may remove the difficulty.

And then you have always the great world of "camouflage" to fall back on. A cup of cocoa, which is usually nice and warm, and has a little sugar in it, and is a rich brown color, and does not remind the baby of her milk at all, is really nearly all milk and will do as well. And then a great deal of her food can be cooked in milk. There are milk soups and milk puddings, and milk on cereals, and milk (or cream), and sugar on the soft part of a baked apple, and bread and milk for supper, with a little butter or cream and a little sugar added, and milk gravies, all of which are allowed at eighteen months of age. So that you can easily give a baby of eighteen months about three pints of milk every day in all these various forms and that is the greatest part of the food she needs.

There is a wild and wandering rumor going through Canada at present which disturbs me more than all the rumors of political change. This rumor is to the effect that in the rural parts of Canada, East and West, parents are forgetting what an essential and valuable and indispensable food we have in milk, and are not giving it to their children as much as they used to, and so the children are not getting as much milk as they really need.

I wonder if that rumor has any foundation. I am afraid it has. We are so apt to undervalue the great things because they come to us freely and because we possess them. Sunshine and fresh air for example. They are free and ever-present, and yet our house air is often not fresh, and I saw a house the other day, which had been "planned,"—if you could call it planned—and built, so that the part of the house that enjoyed the Eastern sun was—The Wood Shed!

CHILDREN must have milk. No other food can take its place. Whatever we feed the baby on, the one thing we must give her is milk. Yes—to eat—for milk is a food—not a beverage. It is solid almost as soon as it enters the stomach, and so we should sip it slowly, and never "drink it down."

But about Bovril. All these meat-broths or meat soups apparently contain more of the substances called "extractives" than of the real nourishment of the meat. So they are not of special food value. But any food that is relished is good for a change, and soup or broth, which is usually hot, quickly digested, and pleasant to the taste, has its own place in a meal, or as a hot drink. Besides, as is probably the case with Bovril, other nourishing things may be added. But nothing compares with milk in being "Good for the Baby."

BRITISH COLUMBIA
 Women's Institutes have devoted a good deal of time to public health interests, and from them comes the following report:

The aims and objects of the Women's Institutes are to improve conditions of rural life, so that settlement may be permanent and prosperous in the farming communities.

Settlement cannot be permanent and prosperous if health conditions are not good. Health conditions or public health cannot be good without nursing service and medical attention.

"Public health is the foundation upon which rests the happiness of the people and the strength of the nation," said Disraeli, one of the greatest of English statesmen; therefore, what higher ideal can any patriotic organization have than to improve conditions of rural life by establishing a public-health nursing system to the end that illness and death in the farming communities need not be due to lack of nursing care or medical assistance?

The first step is securing information as to the need of a Public Health Nurse in the community.

The Annual Report of the Provincial Board of Health, mailed free upon request, contains figures from the local schools on the results of medical inspection, infant mortality, deaths at child-birth, and of contagious and other diseases.

Secure the interest and support of all prominent citizens and representatives of any important industries in the district. Call a preliminary meeting where the explicit information from the source mentioned can be presented and the plan of organization discussed.

Hold a public meeting at which a Public Health Nurse, Health Inspector of Schools, or a public-health worker can speak on conditions as outlined by figures, and give results obtained by Public Health Nurses in other districts. Have it voted that a Public Health Committee shall be formed, consisting of representatives from all voluntary organizations, fraternal and co-operative societies, and especially School Boards and Municipal Councils.

The advantage of having the committee composed of such representatives will be to secure and maintain the support of the organizations represented. These representatives will report to their respective organizations on the progress and effect of the work, thus making the health of the community the business of all.

Funds may be raised in various ways.

Nursing Fees for Bedside Care.—These fees are collected by the nurse for bedside care, attendance at operations, and confinements.

The committee usually sets the amount charged for the nursing visits, and it is recommended from experience that it is better to combine collection with nursing visits.

Contributions.—Each home in the community should be asked for a monthly or yearly contribution.

Grants.—School Boards should be asked to make grants in consideration of school-nursing being carried on.

The Municipal Council in a town or municipality should be asked to make a grant.

Each organization should be asked to pledge a certain amount of balance required.

The Public Health Committee should meet frequently and discuss policies and systematic expansion of the work with the nurse. The nursing work can only be carried on with the sympathetic support of an intelligent community. It should be the duty of the committee with the assistance of the nurse to create an interest in and provide information for the public health of the community.

Through the agency of the organizations represented, each home should be canvassed for financial support. Afterwards each organization represented can decide what proportion of the balance will be its share.

QUEBEC WOMEN'S INSTITUTES.

Reports from the various Women's Institutes throughout the Province of Quebec, are full of enthusiasm. Good work is being accomplished along their various lines of activity.

Dundee Institute has contributed money to the Children's Memorial Hospital, Montreal, to the married and single, were invited to attend. A musical programme was given and refreshments served. The wish was expressed that Institute meetings came more often. This Institute is doing much good work for the improvement of the schools in their vicinity.

Way's Mills Institute is helping the needy in their midst. They are also adopting methods to arouse public interest in the need of a public playground for the children. The Institute is raising funds for the purchase of this playground.

Belvidere Institute is devoting its attention to deeds of kindness in the community.

Orford Institute had a paper entitled, "Women on the Farm," which was full of interest. This Institute has outgrown its bounds and a new branch has been formed.

Lennoxville Institute held an afternoon tea in their club room in the winter, the proceeds of which were given to the town library. Plans are being made to take up work along lines mapped out by Mrs. Rodger, Convenor of the Provincial Child Welfare Committee.

The Institutes in Sherbrooke County enjoyed a visit from Demonstrators from Macdonald College about the middle of January.

Very interesting are the reports from the Radford Girls' Institute. At one meeting a demonstration was given on "sewing," which proved of practical interest to the young members. Two plays have been given by these girls, the financial results of which were $305.00. A special meeting was called, when a barrel of clothing, books, etc., was packed and forwarded to Miss Kirby of the Soldiers' Settlement Board, for use in her work.

Leeds Institute is buying a Victrola for use in their entertainments.

Austin Institute is still "carrying on" for Home and Country."

Murrells Institute is doing sewing as a means to raise funds.

NOVA SCOTIA INSTITUTES.

THERE has been no report published during the last few months, of the activities of the Nova Scotia Women's Institutes, nevertheless, they have been busy as usual, and most interesting accounts of their work and meetings have come to hand.

At Christmas time many of the Institutes added to their enjoyment of Christmas by remembering those who might otherwise have had little Christmas cheer. In this way the inmates of several poor farms were remembered, Grand Pre, Sheffield Mills, Habitant, Bible Hill Institutes being active in this connection. Tatamagouche sent a number of Christmas stockings to Kentville Sanatorium, and Martock and Windsor Forks, as well as Kemptville. Yarmouth County sent contributions to the Christmas fund at the Sanatorium. Tatamagouche also prepared Christmas stockings and boxes for a number in their community, who thus were insured a happy Christmas time. Wentworth Institute gave Christmas gifts to the children in the school. Sewing clubs, which meet weekly or fortnightly, have been formed by several of the Institutes, namely: D'Escousse, Mabou, Scotch Village, Sherbrooke.

A few other items of interest are here given:

Arcadia is working for a war memorial.

Bear River Institute edits a page in a local newspaper. They are making plans to start a Public Library.

Bridgetown.—At a recent meeting the Public Health Nurse addressed the Institute, telling of her work and the opportunity for co-operation.

Borwick has been studying "Civics."

Canning entertained the members of Sheffield Mills Institute at their January meeting. A most enjoyable meeting was held. Both Institutes contributed to the programme.

GRANDMOTHERS' DAY

At Vermilion, Alberta, it has been a custom for this Institute to entertain the grandmothers of the community. This is a picture of the happy event.

McGill Fund, and to the local church. Community work is also being carried on.

Eardley Institute had a paper on "The Dignity of Household Work," by one of their members. Two new members joined.

Argenteuil Institute had a demonstration on dressmaking by Miss Buzzell, of Macdonald College. Interesting letters were read at their last meeting from one of their members who is a missionary in China.

At a recent meeting of Vinton Institute, the men,

RENEW YOUR LINOLEUM

IS your linoleum dull and dead-looking? Bring it back to life and it will reflect a bright, clean, well-cared-for home. All you need is Johnson's Prepared Wax and a cloth.

Johnson's Prepared Wax brings out the pattern of linoleum—preserves and protects it from wear. It doesn't take long—an ordinary sized floor can be polished in less than an hour and it may be walked upon immediately. Waxed linoleum and tile are easy to keep clean—they require but little care.

JOHNSON'S Paste - Liquid - Powdered PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax is the ideal furniture polish—but it does more than merely polish—it renders the same service as a piece of plate glass over a desk, table or dresser top.

Johnson's Prepared Wax comes in three convenient forms: Paste Wax for polishing all floors—wood, linoleum, tile or marble. Liquid Wax for polishing furniture, woodwork and automobiles. Powdered Wax for a perfect dancing surface.

Johnson's Prepared Wax and Artistic Wood Finishes are manufactured in Canada by Canadians.

"The Mountebank," a novel by William J. Locke, author of "The Red Planet," "Simon the Jester," etc. Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto. Price, $2.00.

THIS English novelist is one who believes in the joy of life, even in the midst of alarms and disaster. He captured the English-reading public with "The Beloved Vagabond," and his charm is yet fresh and alluring although he now has more than a score of novels to his credit. Andrew Lackaday is a hero, indeed, with many gallant adventures in his career and a mystery in his life which makes him something of a riddle to the very last. There is a charming lady in the story, to be sure, Lady Auriol Dayne, who is not easily won and who keeps the hero and the reader in suspense. The adventures of Andrew and the attraction of Lady Auriol may well beguile an evening and will give the reader a vivid and not disheartening glimpse of after-the-war London and Paris.

"A Pawn in Pawn," a novel by Hilda M. Sharp, author of "The Stars in Their Courses." Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto. Price, $2.00.

THIS story, having for its heroine a small girl who was rescued from a "Home," nick-named the "Pawn Shop," is told in whimsical but sympathetic fashion by a middle-aged gentleman who is "Uncle Dick," to the dainty little Lydia, who finds herself rather homesick as the adopted daughter of the successful dramatist and poet, Julian Tarrant. The orphan asylum heroine is quite popular with novelists, for she has a certain mystery and melancholy all her own—and she is invariably a charming young person, in a fashion quite unknown to those of undoubted parentage. Lydia is no exception to this rule and is, indeed, quite the most interesting orphan of them all—even taking "Judy" of the popular "Daddy Long Legs" into consideration. So, of course, more than one lover falls to the lot of this fair lady but, in the end... However, the end must be found out by the reader for himself—or herself. The two elderly gentlemen, Julian and Richard, are quite as interesting as the younger figures—although we admit that it is only an English writer who can give us such characters, with their old-world leisurely attractiveness. The Great War breaks across the quiet of the secluded country life.

This is a readable story and Lydia's romance has a fragrance all its own. But the most memorable paragraph of all is that which follows the story of the death of Billy—Uncle Dick's gallant young nephew.

"And we sang, 'The Son of God goes forth to war'—a hymn that has always seemed to me too stirring to be set to the sighs of the meek and the passive persecuted... And the last verse my fancy dedicates to the Airmen—the gallant boys who, with a laugh and a jest on their lips and, perhaps, a shy, more solemn thought in their hearts, go up so eagerly to meet Death somewhere in the clouds or the shell-torn darkness—climbing the steep ascent of Heaven—the difficult way to the stars."

"Our Absent Hero, poems in Loving Memory of Captain William Arthur Peel Durie," by Mrs. Durie. Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto. Price, $1.25.

THIS volume, from its very title, makes an appeal to all who have tragic and tender memories of the Great War, and its literary style would make it acceptable to any reader. These lines in the closing poem, "Morning," close in a key of hope and triumph.

"A glory streaming from on high
Touches the earth from pole to pole;

The day breaks in the eastern sky,
And it is morning, O my soul!

"You, bravest soldier, soaring free,
While here by truth and duty led,
In tasting immortality
Have given new radiance to the dead."

"Cooking Without Mother's Help," a story cook book for beginners, by Clara Ingram Judson. Published by the Nourse Company, New York.

THIS little book is truly delightful, both in text and illustration; and how any little girl could read it and not wish to go and cream salmon or make beefsteak balls, we cannot understand. Alice Gerald is taught by a most "understanding" mother just how to accomplish these and other satisfactory feats in cooking and this most attractive little book tells how the work was done. Cooking is a pleasure, we contend, if only it is done under the encouraging conditions of a bright kitchen and shining utensils. Read about this new Alice in a Wonderland of her own cooking, and you will be convinced that to be Queen of Tarts is the highest distinction of all.

"Hydro-Electric Development in Ontario," a history of Water-Power Administration under the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, by E. H. Biggar. Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto.

THERE is not a household of Ontario to which "Hydro" is unknown, and the story of the development of this Commission and its work is a modern fairy tale about our marvellous resources and their equally wonderful use in bringing cheap power and light to the communities in thousands of square miles of territory in Ontario. Every one of the twenty chapters is of interest, especially that considering "Electricity on the Farm." This comment is of significance: "There is little doubt that if the people of Ontario had left the great water powers as the prerogative of monopoly-hunting companies, a considerable local industry would have been built up at Niagara Falls and two or three other spots, while the depopulation of rural Ontario at large, which is giving so much concern to our statesmen, would be going on towards the ultimate crisis. It is logical, therefore, to anticipate that cheap electric power, on the principle laid down by the Commission, will do more than anything else to arrest the depopulation of the farms of Ontario and raise the status of agriculture to a new high level."

THE MOUNTEBANK

DUNLOP MEANS "MORE MILEAGE"

"The Dunlop Cord Tire just taken off our Touring Car has run 23,341 Miles."—From a Victoria Motor Owner.

"The Dunlop Tire I brought back to be retreaded ran 23,000 Miles in truck service."—From a Calgary Motor Owner.

Just a few words from two letters, but these excerpts represent what thousands of motorists are obtaining from Dunlop Cord Tires in actual service.

There is no getting away from the fact that in Cord tire quality we had the jump on the field in 1920. As a matter of fact, the comparison of any other Cord is always with "DUNLOP."

Why Dunlop if it is not the one to beat? Dunlop is out there in front simply because in Cord tire construction we put out our very best at the very first.

Your Health

The Family Physician has written an excellent column of advice for this month's issue, and we know that every reader who is so fortunate as to have a baby to take care of will be interested in what is said regarding the diet of the smallest member of the household. It must be remembered that the Department of Health and the Home does not include diagnosis. Reflection will show how undesirable such an attempt would be—but assistance and advice will often come through its columns, and perplexed correspondents—especially those who live in remote districts—are welcome to the "office," even if there may be only a long-distance bell.

Health and the Home

There are other foods which may be given at the age of eighteen months, likely to be regarded by baby, from her point of view, as "Grand and Glorious." She will take a great interest in them, and it is exceedingly important to interest children in their food. The world is such a wonderful place to them, and their own play is so pleasant that sometimes meals seem an unwelcome interruption. So at meal-times Mother or Father must always sit beside the baby and keep her attention concentrated on her food, and "show her how," and tell her little stories about what she is eating. See that she eats slowly.

Even before twelve months of age if the baby is doing well, she has likely had a wee bit of bread and butter crisp toast, crust and cereals, such as oatmeal, cream of wheat, or farina and other foods already mentioned. The soft part of a baked apple, or a baked potato (with a little butter or gravy) may be given at about a year and at the age of fifteen months, a coddled or soft boiled egg. If the baby is doing well, part of the yolk of a soft boiled egg may be given about the age of twelve months.

Never give a baby two new articles of diet at once. Wait a week, or a few days, till the last new food has proved a success.

IN CHINA.

By Elizabeth J. Coatsworth.

The sun is only the sun here
But every day when he goes to China
He is a celestial dragon, breathing gold and scarlet,
And the moon here is only a moon
But over the pagodas she is a white
Phoenix,
And there the stars are little silver unicorns with crystal crowns.
The iris are not like our iris, nor the chrysanthemums like our chrysanthemums,
For at dusk they hide bewitching mouths behind little fans
And the gardens are filled with the sound of their shoes;
The willow trees there cover white faces with their long sleeves
And the fox-bride is pledged in cups of green jade. . . .
And we, we are only lovers here,
But who knows what we might be . . .
in China!

NATURE'S PLANTING.

THERE is a fascination about Nature's planting plan, similar to that of a musician's improvisation. With a theme, say, of meadow, hill, grove, desert, brookside or lake margin, Nature feels her way with many charming pauses for inspiration between brilliant variations. She will introduce a bright colony of tiny low-growing star-flowers that rush over the ground like sparkling cadenzas, groups of larger flowers that bind the composition together like noble chords, single lily stalks rising alone like sweet wandering arias, and long sweeps of flowerless swards like unexpected, impressive rests. The brook never makes a straight line from source to destination as if it were driven like an arrow with some definite purpose to a definite goal. It winds its way through meadow and grove, loitering under shady trees, hurrying around grassy knolls, splashing between huge boulders, slipping stealthily among reeds and sedges, leaving toll of flowers, grasses, mosses, shrubs and trees. Impulsive, yet somehow very dependable, it delights the eye as nothing fixed, or formal is able to do.

Tiny rompers of pink and blue, Mistress Betty's cunning little smocks and underthings—all are treated with a fine disregard by little people who love to play with all their might!

BUT Mother-Who-Is-Wise views the rumpled, mussy clothes with unruffled calm. Into the shiny copper tub of her 1900 Cataract Electric Washer she pops them, and turns on the electric current. Back and forth smoothly rocks the tub, swishing the warm, soapy water through the clothes in a figure 8 motion—that famous, exclusive movement which makes the 1900 the peer among washing machines!

No parts in that gleaming copper tub to rub against the tiny underthings! Nothing to wrench off buttons, or tear the finest Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes!

Through the swinging reversible wringer they go—which also works electrically—and in less time than it takes to tell, out they come and are gaily nodding and fluttering on the sunny clothes line, spotless and fresh as new!

And in the very same tub go the heaviest sheets and table linens; for the 1900 is a very democratic machine which washes everything equally well—all because of that famous figure 8 motion.

You can buy a "1900" Washer on deferred payments and have the use of it several weeks on approval before you pay any money; or even commit yourself positively to buying it. We believe you will like it so well that you'll not want to part with it afterwards.

Flowers for Various Purposes and Places

By A. B. CUTTING

"Gardening is the purest of human pleasures, the greatest refreshment to the spirit of man."

—Francis Bacon.

THESE words, written some three hundred years ago, should be emblazoned all over the land to-day, for never perhaps in the history of the world has there been such seeking after pleasure as now, nor has the spirit of man ever been in greater need of refreshment. Gardening offers a satisfying charm not exceeded by any other occupation. For a long period of time, it has been the recreation of men and women in all stations of life. It is still a fascinating and delightful hobby to countless people.

In early spring, with the unfolding of the earliest buds and blossoms, the gardening instinct makes its strongest appeal. The sight and the feel of newly-turned soil is one of the finest tonics. As the season progresses and plants develop, gardening becomes an increasing source of restful enjoyment and ever-growing interest. The harvesting of fresh fruits and vegetables, and the gathering of fresh flowers brings a sense of satisfaction that cannot be expressed in money values. And the wonders of plant growth are worthy of study by the million and the millionaire. Whether followed as a profession or as a hobby, gardening is a work of absorbing interest, a recreation of wide-spread influence, an invigorator of the spirit of youth.

The Indispensable Flowers.

NO phase of gardening appeals more to the average person than the culture of flowers. Nearly everybody has an innate feeling of regard for ornamental plants, and especially for those that delight the eye with their bloom. And probably no classes of flowering plants are more popular than the annuals and the perennials. Hundreds of species and varieties of both these classes are available for the gardener who has the room and the desire. The planting guide of this page gives a few of the ones best suited for growing in everybody's garden, and tells in tabulated form the details of culture and usefulness.

Almost all of the annuals can be grown successfully by sowing the seed where the plants are to stand. The seed-bed should always be thoroughly prepared, with good drainage and an abundance of well-decomposed fertilizer worked in. But it is much the better plan, in this northern country, wherever it can be done, to start the plants in hot-beds, cold-frames, greenhouses or boxes of earth in the house, from which they are transplanted to the open ground. The planting guide tells which annuals are best suited for one or the other plan, and, in many cases, indicates that certain kinds are adaptable to both.

The perennials should be the foundation of the flower garden or of the floral effects of the home landscape.

As one landscape authority has said, "the hardy herbaceous perennials, as a class, are the easiest to manage, the cheapest and the most naturalistic in the effect they give, of all the plants that grow." They may be used in almost any situation where plants are wanted at all. As they are planted for permanency, special care must be given the preparation of the ground, see that it is dug at least eighteen inches deep and that the good surface soil is left on top during the digging. A liberal quantity of old-rotted manure should be worked in to the bottom. Some wood ashes and about half a pound of bone meal to the square yard might also be thoroughly incorporated with the top soil.

Many of the perennials may be grown easily from seed, but it usually takes a year before most species are sufficiently advanced for planting in permanent quarters. The directions in the planting guide refer to the use of plants, not seeds. Many kinds can be propagated also easily by division.

Space for this article forbids mention of planting plans. Whether annuals or perennials are grown, whether among shrubbery or in beds or borders, whether for special purposes or for special places, the following grouping of some of the kinds mentioned in the planting guide may be suggestive:

The Mendelssohn Choir

By HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

The History of a Canadian Musical Organization
Internationally Famous

CONDUCTOR OF
THE MENDELSSOHN CHOIR
Dr. H. A. Fricker, former Conductor of the Leeds Choir, who is holding high the Mendelssohn traditions for choral achievement.

WHEREVER a man may fare in the musical circles of the English-speaking world, so soon as it is learned that he comes from Toronto, the response comes quickly, "Oh, that is the home of the Mendelssohn Choir!" Much of the prestige that the leading English-speaking city of Canada enjoys in the greater centres of the United States, is based on its fame. It is now regarded by musical critics everywhere as the premier singing society of this continent, and the gradual disbandment of other notable choral institutions makes it now one of the oldest choruses in America, though in its re-organized form it dates from the dawn of the present century. Its great prestige seems to be responsible for its immunity from decadence which has overtaken many of the most successful and artistic choral organizations.

The man who founded it and created that prestige is still in middle age, though he laid down the conductor's baton in 1917. He is Dr. Augustus Stephen Vogt, the managing director of the Toronto Conservatory of Music, and a Canadian by birth. His name is so thoroughly entwined with the history of the Mendelssohn Choir, that an account of his early career, is important. He was born in 1861, in Elmira, Waterloo County, one of the Pennsylvania Dutch settlements of Western Ontario. His father, however, was a native of Baden, who fled to Canada in 1848, after participating in a rising which was put down with a bloody hand by Prussia. Dr. Vogt was one of a large family, and, when he as a lad, developed musical aspirations was compelled to earn the money for his education. From the age of twelve until seventeen he was organist of the Lutheran Church at Elmira, and later, from seventeen to twenty, of the First Methodist Church, St. Thomas, Ontario. Finally he was able to continue his studies at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, and at the famous Conservatory of Music, at Leipzig, Germany, where he excelled in piano, organ, theory and composition. His first real choral experience began in 1888, when he

A Man-at-Arms Comes Home

By J. E. MIDDLETON

(Dedicated respectfully to Mr. Bliss Carman.)

The well-known Canadian poet, Bliss Carman, has made a brave fight for health and strength during the last three years, and his many admirers will be glad to know that his struggle has been successful. Mr. Carman paid a visit to Toronto during the past winter and, at a little gathering in his honor, Mr. J. E. Middleton read the following greeting:

ANNERS flowing, rippling in the sunny wind—
The three Saints' crosses glowing, cheery and kind—

Folk jammed in the narrow street,
The pulse of marching feet,
And the brazen shout of the bands—

So comes the warrior home from alien lands.

Never a pennon snapped in the breeze to-day,
Never a gaping citizen stood by the way,
No trumpet-tone rang clear,
Yet a fighting man was here,
A singer of songs I know,
Who conquered alone an unseen, pitiless foe.

But ever since he turned his hand to the lute,
While his Art was growing, ripening like the fruit
In the saffron Autumn days,
He fought for the sweeter ways,
Such ways as the world once knew
Ere the Devil-of-Things had throttled the good and true.

Though the flags be housed and nobody turn to cheer,
Let my hat be off and my shout be high and clear,
For this brave Poet contemns
The race for money and gems,
And sings, at the high gods' will,
Of the stars, and the sea, and the spruce on a Northern hill.

A Varnish that will retain its Satiny Finish.

DOUGALL UNIVERNISH differs from most other varnishes in that it is proof against boiling water, grease or cleaning fluids. It superimposes upon woodwork a satiny surface, which can be washed with hot water and soap without the least injury to its original brilliancy.

Made as a clear varnish and in six beautiful transparent colors. Equally good for outdoor or indoor use—wherever a beautiful and long lasting varnish is required.

was appointed organist and choir-master of Jarvis St. Baptist Church, Toronto. At that time he became associated in a pedagogical way with the late Dr. Torrington, who had earned the title of "The father of good music in Toronto," by his long service as Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. In the early nineties, however, the latter organization fell on evil days, Toronto was without a choral society of real importance, and in 1894, Dr. Vogt seized the opportunity to carry out ideas he had formed as a student. His belief was that if choral music was to be revived, it must be by giving the public something better than in the past. His aim was to create a singing society whose tonal quality and expression should approximate to that of a fine orchestra. In a first class orchestra there is no jarring tone; every performer must be a trained musician, and by this means exquisite finish and shading are obtainable. Such excellence had not been thought possible in connection with any choral organization in Canada; rough spots had been taken for granted and many deficiencies covered up by instrumental support.

The only way in which a chorus of finer perfection could be developed was through the medium of capella or unaccompanied singing. The phrase comes from the old custom of chapel singing, where the choristers were obliged to render their notes truly from sight, without the aid of organ or orchestral music which was confined to the Cathedral proper. Capella singing is only tolerable when all the voices are true and sweet; but it admits of much finer effects in shading than ordinary forms of choral music and is the only effective means of affording a chorus a severe disciplinary training in sight reading and tonal production. Earlier musicians who had made such attempts in Toronto, had given up in despair the task of making their choristers do the requisite hard-work involved. Nevertheless, Dr. Vogt, undiscouraged by the failures of others, made the attempt and with the co-operation of a few staunch enthusiasts, the Mendelssohn Choir was formed, and managed to attract to its numbers many singers with good voices and the necessary preliminary training. Its first concert in 1894 won the approbation of the public, and for three seasons thereafter it confined itself to concerts of unaccompanied music. Then in 1897, to the surprise of everyone, Dr. Vogt suddenly decided to disband it. The choir was supposed to have met with the fate of its predecessors, but in reality the conductor intended to remake it on a nobler scale, and to give it a constitution that would insure its permanent excellence. He had discerned that the main cause of the failure of most choral societies was the decline in quality of the voices. Without some process of elimination the same old choristers went on singing year after year, getting a little staler season by season, until public indifference made it impossible to continue.

CAREFULLY perfecting his plans. Dr. Vogt remained quiescent for three years, but in 1900, came back with a new Mendelssohn Choir, constituted on lines entirely different from anything that had ever been heard of before on this continent. That is to say, it disbanded under its constitution at the end of each musical season; and all its members must submit to a new voice and reading test in the following autumn. The

The Wind Wheel of the Djinn

The Home of Happy Scenes

By BERTHA E. GREEN

ILLUSTRATED BY GUINEVERE PARTRIDGE

THE great wheel of the wind was still. Aewol, the Djinn, sat motionless beside it, and watched the wind that he had just sped upon its way. A clear, high-singing North wind rushed on its outward course and soon was lost beyond the rim of the sky.

A faint humming sound broke the silence, as the soft voice of distant waters, and a welcoming light kindled in Aewol's eyes. It was the voice of a home-coming wind, one that neither loitered on its way nor raced in heedlessness nor anger. So there was a smile in Aewol's eyes when the wind broke into view from the Southwest and came gladly, eagerly, to its master. Then, as he wound it slowly, evenly, upon the wheel, he read its

"What does old Peter know about the cold, when he stays indoors by the fire all day and smokes his pipe? Why, I just know he's never seen a rabbit ever since the first snow came on the ground last fall."

BUT little Beth still kept a serious face, and she shook her head slowly as she said:

"You know, Stewart, father owns all the country nearby, far as you can see, and there must be so many little folks like rabbits whose homes near here are not as warm and cosy as our own."

The morning was not half over but dull clouds covered the sky, and the children knew better than to wander far from the safety that lay with-pictured story, its tale of wandering in the Home of Happy Days.

The snow lay deep in a white waste to North and East and West. To the Southward, a curving line showed the course of an ice-bound river, with here and there small groves of trees close to its banks. It was late winter in Alberta, and frost was king.

Half sheltered by one of the larger groves of trees, the buildings of a homestead clustered. The low log-house, with the smoke curling from its chimney, formed the centre of a group of larger buildings for horses and cattle. Large haystacks rose like gigantic bee hives, each with its own snow-cap, and over and around all lay the white drift.

"And old Peter said even the biggest rabbits would get their toes frosted if it stayed so cold much longer."

It was little Beth, rosy cheeked and black eyed, dressed snugly as an Eskimo, but in wool instead of furs. She stood close by the river-bank, near a snowladen, stunted oak.

A larger figure stood beside her, her brother Stewart, a little older, and, as he believed, of course, ever so much wiser.

in the fences. But within this boundary there lay their playground and thither they had come this morning to find that someone had been there before them.

There were little, smudgy marks upon the snow that to these outdoor children told as plainly as could be who their visitor had been. More than one rabbit had been there before them, and knowing the little furry people, the children waited for them to come back.

They were warmly clad; so Stewart scooped up a snow-house without a roof, and in it he and Beth sat, snugly waiting.

A sharp nose was poked cautiously around the corner of the snow-house and a pair of sharp eyes, and a pair of sharp ears, followed. These belonged to the fox who never did an unwise thing, and he sat down by the doorway of the snow-house, and grinned knowingly.

This was the first of their visitors, and, while Beth wondered if the fox's toes were cold, Stewart told her of the fox's home far down the river where the trees made a small forest. And the fox listened, and knew that the secret of his den was safe with the children.

Baby's Perfume

Dear Edith:

Is there any scent hidden in flowers so ineffably sweet as the fragrance of a freshly bathed baby?

Yet I know mothers who actually profane baby's body with highly scented powders which were meant only for adult use.

If it were only a question of good taste, I suppose it wouldn't matter much, but strong scents in baby powder are really objectionable for a more serious reason.

They often give Baby a very unpleasant headache—and the fretfulness that follows is apt to give you a headache, too.

I don't know that these strong perfumes are actually dangerous, but an unbroken rule of mine is never to take chances or experiment on a baby's sensitive skin. There is one tal-cum that I know is safe and that is the kind I use.

Mennen's, in the familiar blue can, has been the choice of mothers, nurses and doctors for nearly half a century and it has never yet harmed nor failed to relieve a baby's skin. It is different—and right—what I call a perfectly balanced powder—just enough of each ingredient and not too much of anything.

I use Mennen's on my own skin, which, after all, is about as sensitive as that of a baby.

Lovingly,
BELLE.

TWENTY years ago, as she lay in her cradle, a rose-petal atom of humanity, your thoughts sped in fancy to this day, and then you laughed as you touched the soft cheek.

To-day, as she sits in Convocation Hall with other white-frosted graduates, half hidden behind their barrier of roses, again your fancy plays tricks. You see an eager, curly-headed little daughter, three, four, six, eight years old, every year full of discoveries for her and endearing memories for you.

An odd sense of loneliness possesses you, for there seems a new dignity and remoteness about her in the scholastic cap and gown. Then, across the mist of faces, she catches your eye. Her cheeks dimple into smiles. And you, fond old father, actually flush with pleasure, as, raising her wrist to her lips, she wafts you a happy kiss from the face of the beautiful little Elgin Watch you placed there an hour ago, as your best gift for her great day.

door is thus opened to new and gifted applicants for membership, and the choristers who show a decline retire. It may seem a harsh process, but it is the method of Nature, in her dealings with vegetation, and, as in Nature, it insures permanent existence. The date of the incorporation of the re-organized Mendelssohn Choir under letters patent was September 19th, 1900, and its first concert took place on February 16th, 1901.

It soon became apparent that Dr. Vogt had plans of wider scope than the presentation of the short though difficult forms of unaccompanied music. While these forms are all important in bringing choristers to that perfection of orchestral expression at which he aimed, choral works of the grander or festival order call for orchestra and soloists as well. It was the aim of the conductor to present to the Canadian public the very highest achievements in the realm of musical composition. In 1902 the concerts of the Mendelssohn Choir first assumed that Festival character which has ever since characterized them, through co-operation with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, then conducted by the celebrated composer, Victor Herbert.

Such plans could not have been implemented without the support of an able business organization. This Dr. Vogt had seen to during the period of suspended activity alluded to, and the success of the organization has been in a measure due to the fact that from a business standpoint it has probably been the best-managed singing society in the world. It has been both courageous and far-seeing; has rendered a great service to the cause of music in Toronto, in other respects than the development of choral music. Through the Mendelssohn Choir the public was enabled to hear great orchestral works adequately presented. Before the choir's expansive policy was embarked on, orchestral concerts were few and far between, and though occasionally famous conductors visited Toronto, it was with fractional forces of forty or fifty men. The practice of bringing the symphony orchestras in their full strength was inaugurated by the Mendelssohn Choir, and through it public taste became sufficiently developed to render such expensive policies profitable. The charge sometimes made in other cities, that the domination of the Mendelssohn Choir in Toronto's musical affairs, has led to a disproportionate concentration on choral music, is entirely ill-founded.

The orchestral co-operation begun with Victor Herbert and the Pittsburgh Orchestra was continued when two years later, Dr. Emil Paur, a German conductor of the highest rank, succeeded Victor Herbert. Paur was a man of enormous experience on both sides of the ocean; and it was in association with him that Dr. Vogt began those visits to American cities which in a short while brought international fame. The first experiment of the kind was made at Buffalo on February 23rd, 1905. The writer was present in the audience on that occasion, and on all sides it was admitted that such superb tonal volume and such beauty in finely shaded and planissimo passages was unprecedented in that city.

The climax of the choir's earlier achievements up to that time was reached, a year or two later, when it was decided to present Beethoven's

Choral Symphony. Three movements of it are purely orchestral, but in the final one, Beethoven felt that instruments alone were insufficient to express the emotions he wished to convey; and made a radical departure from precedent by adding a choral setting of Schiller's "Hymn to Joy." When he had completed it, a musician to whom he submitted the score advised him to amend it on the ground that no choristers could be found who would be equal to the task of singing it. Beethoven's reply was to the effect that he was willing to wait until God created the necessary voices. Dr. Paur, who had conducted the work in Germany, had been extremely anxious to do so in America, but until he came into association with the Mendelssohn Choir, had been unable to find a chorus equal to the task. Those who listened for the first time, to this rarely-heard work will never forget the night in February of 1906, when the full splendor of the achievement dawned on them. Such of Dr. Vogt's friends as were acquainted with the history of the Choral Symphony had been dubious as to whether he could train his choristers to the pitch of excellence that was demanded. Afterward Dr. Paur, who conducted, admitted that there was no choir in Europe who could have sung it so well.

THE Buffalo concerts, which had become an annual event, led to a proposal to take the Choir to New York for two concerts in Carnegie Hall. The fact that the organization could sing the Choral Symphony, which was almost as great a novelty there as in Toronto, was in itself an inducement. This work was the feature of the series, but the Choir was also able to show its unique excellence in the amazingly difficult chapel music of the early composers, Palestrina and Orlando Lasso. Most of the famous critics of America were present and they wrote of its achievements in superlatives. The Pittsburgh Orchestra having fallen into a period of decline, a working arrangement was made with a larger and finer organization, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, now known as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Frederick Stock and in point of excellence and tradition, one of the great orchestras of the world. This combination proved extremely happy, and in conjunction, the two institutions made a large number of American appearances. In 1909, Chicago was visited and its plaudits equalled those of New York. In 1910, Cleveland was added to the Choir's field. In 1912 it paid its second visit to New York, and if possible, received a warmer welcome than before, and in the same week journeyed to Boston. The Boston visit had been regarded with some trepidation, for, throughout the nineteenth century, Boston had been regarded as the musical centre of America, in all save opera, and boasted the oldest singing body on the continent. But as in New York and Chicago, superlatives were the rule.

Among the innumerable institutions affected by the war, the Mendelssohn Choir was not spared. After the Boston success of 1912, the Choir suspended activities for one year, during the absence of Dr. Vogt on a musical pilgrimage to Europe. There he found that the fame of his organization had preceded him, and all arrangements were completed for a tour of the "Mendelssohns" during the autumn of 1914, covering the leading musical centres of Great Britain, France, Germany and Belgium. The bullet at Sarajevo in June of that year destroyed that project. When the tour was projected it was felt that it would be the greatest advertisement that Canada had ever received abroad; but it was destined that the advertisement should take another form,—the valor and sacrifice of Canada's sons on the battlefields of France and Flanders.

Restricted as it was by war conditions, and by the difficulty of obtaining orchestral co-operation, the Mendelssohn Choir, nevertheless, succeeded in carrying on. Dr. Vogt, during four successive seasons, conducted without remuneration on condition that his fee should be devoted to patriotic purposes. On February 6th, 1917, the Choir had completed its twentieth season of actual performance, and had sung its seventy-eighth concert under Dr. Vogt's baton. The pressure of his duties as directing head of the Toronto Conservatory of Music and the strain on a system never very robust, had made it imperative that he retire; but he did not do so until the permanence of the organization under a gifted successor had been secured. While Dr. Vogt had been building up fame in America, another conductor, Dr. Herbert A. Fricker, had been winning similar laurels in Great Britain and France as conductor of the Leeds Choir. By a stroke of good fortune, it was possible to offer sufficient inducements to Dr. Fricker to bring him to Toronto. The armistice of November, 1918, also rendered it possible to bring great orchestras to Canada once more without incurring passport difficulties and the co-operation of the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, a Polish-Irishman of British training, and perhaps the finest of the younger generation of conductors, was secured. The coming April concerts will be the third series in which this combination will have been heard, and last year, it was made evident that the Mendelssohn Choir had emerged from its trials in all its pre-war splendor.

A catalogue of the works it has rendered in the course of its existence would occupy almost as much space as this article. Suffice it to say that there is nothing beyond its range; it has won honor in the "Choral Symphony" of Beethoven, the Brahms' "Requiem," the Verdi "Manzoni Requiem," and other immortal compositions of the most supreme difficulty, and countless composers past and present, possess in its interpretations the ideal expression of their conceptions.

How to Shampoo Your Hair Properly

Why the Beauty of Your Hair Depends on the Care You Give It

Illustrated by ALONZO KIMBALL

The R.L.W. Co.

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women use Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp, or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just and dirt that stick to the scalp.

The proper rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water.

When you have done this, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly, using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified.

You can easily tell when the hair is perfectly clean, for it will be soft and silky in the water.

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeals when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want always to be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo.

This regular weekly

Follow This Simple Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Rub the Lather in Thoroughly

TWO or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust

Use plenty of lather. Rub it in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips.

shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

The Wind Wheel of the Djinn

He moved off, unnoticed, to make way for a long-bodied creature, with rich, dark fur, that came up from the river on short, strong legs. This was the otter, and he was even wiser than the fox, for he listened to the children talking before he showed his stubby nose.

WHEN Stewart saw him, he laughed, for there were icicles on the otter's long whiskers. Then Stewart told Beth of the otter's home, and how he lived in summer and winter.

Then came the rabbits: some were shy, a few were saucy, and all were playful. This was not the first time they had met the children, for, in the summertime, Stewart and Beth knew every rabbit's doorway. The children had a glimpse of most of the outdoor folk who stay awake in the winter-time, and Stewart wondered how, when winter was so long and cold, they still found food; and little Beth was sure their toes were cold.

The frost was keen, and the loose snow swept like sand across the open spaces.

"And all the rabbits, and the otter, and the fox, are our very own. Aren't they, Stewart? Their homes are all on our place," said Beth.

"Perhaps that's why they look so happy," said Stewart, "it's their home, just the same as it is ours."

The dull clouds gave way to bright sunshine and to clear sky, and the children rose from the shelter of their snow-house. A change came to the day, the light snow no longer spun in dancing whirls, and the frosty air seemed to lose its sharpness.

Through the bare branches of the oaks, through the snow-laden spruce and pine, a South-west wind was whispering. The air grew softer, even the sunshine seemed brighter, and all the time the South-west wind was singing softly:

Jack Frost, in world of winter cold,
Was playing king;
Had thrown his robe of snowy fold
O'er everything.

Came the soft wind: "Chinook!
Chinook!"

Was all it said;
But, at the word, no backward look,
Jack Frost had fled.

Stewart's eyes widened as he listened.

"It is the Chinook," he said, "it is the wind that drives away the snow, the wind that, even in the coldest winter days, comes to promise spring and tells us of the summer coming."

There was a joyous barking, and two rough-coated dogs came from the house to join the children as they walked homeward. The snow was gone from the roof of the log-house, and the eaves were dripping.

FATHER hailed them and waved a hand as he went out toward the stable to the horses. Their mother stood in the doorway with a welcome smile and a glance to see if their feet were wet. Inside the big kitchen, in his chair sat old Peter, smoking his pipe.

Little Beth ran to him, exclaiming: "The rabbits' toes won't be cold, Peter, for it has come."

"And what may it be that comes to warm rabbits' toes?" asked old Peter, taking his pipe from his mouth.

"Why, it is the Chinook, Peter, and the snow is melting, and it is so warm I think the flowers could come up if they wanted to," replied Beth.

Poor old Peter, it was his lot to have to stay close to the fireside through the cold days. He was no longer able to face the winter winds and winter cold. At the mention of the Chinook, and the coming of warm weather, the old man brightened, and laughed aloud as Stewart, for a moment or two, opened the door and let in a flood of sunshine and snow-sweet air. And the children laughed, too, to see old Peter glad, for he was as dear in their hearts as he held them in his.

With Beth seated upon his chair-arm, and Stewart on the round mat at his feet, old Peter spoke to them of the summer-bringing South-West wind.

"It is a breeze that is born in summer lands, and cradled in summer seas; it is smiled upon by a summer sun, and watched by the stars of summer nights. But it must leave this ever-pleasant home at times, for it has a task, a loving task, to do."

"From the South-West it blows across the sea to the great mountains that lie not so far in from our western ocean."

"The wind has brought to Canada the gathered rain-clouds of a thousand miles to feed the rivers that flow westward down the mountain side. But the wind does not stay. Over the peaks and ridges, through the deep passes it makes its way to the East side of the mountain-chain, across the land that once was held by that great tribe of Indian race, Chinook."

"But still the wind stays not. It comes to us, to our Alberta, bringing its summer warmth, breaking the chain of winter, bound too closely, and promising a summer harvest-time."

"So, little Beth, the wind, Chinook, has saved your little rabbits' toes, perhaps, and told them, too, that there is a springtime coming for them. Its message comes to us each time we feel its breath, and there is a gladness in our hearts; so all the land to which the Chinook comes is, all the year, the home of happy hearts, through happy days."

While just as attractive in appearance as woven rugs, they are made with a firm, waterproof surface which does not absorb dust or dirt. A few seconds with a damp mop will keep them clean and sanitary. Besides, they never curl or "kick up" at the edges and corners. Thus no dirt collects underneath.

Among low-priced rugs, Gold-Seal Congoleum Art-Rugs are by far the most beautiful, satisfactory and popular.

For Every Room in the House

They are made in a wide variety of very beautiful patterns, appropriate for every room in the home. The designs are the work of the foremost artists of the world, who have given them the master touch that wins admiration everywhere.

Some Popular Sauces

By MARY M. NEIL

SAUCE making is one of the most interesting branches of cookery. Almost all dishes are greatly improved by a well-made sauce, while with others the sauce is the very making of it.

When a sauce has to stand some time before being used, stand the saucepan containing it in a larger one with hot water, and cover the sauce with a lid to prevent a skin forming. With very thick sauces one tablespoonful of water or milk, may be run over the top.

White Sauce.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a clean saucepan, add four tablespoonfuls of flour or cornstarch, and mix it with a wooden spoon until perfectly smooth. Cook for a few minutes over the fire but take care that it does not brown, then draw the pan to one side, add one and one-half cupfuls of milk or water, one teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of white pepper, and return to the fire, stir constantly until boiling and cook for eight minutes longer.

If desired, two tablespoonfuls of cream and one teaspoonful of lemon juice may be added just before using.

To make a sweet sauce, omit the seasonings and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar and one-half teaspoonful of vanilla or lemon extract, or a little powdered nutmeg, mace or ginger.

Brown Sauce.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan over the fire, add one carrot sliced, one onion sliced, one bunch of pot herbs, and fry until well browned, then stir in four tablespoonfuls of flour and cook until well browned also, then add one teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of pepper and a few drops of Kitchen Bouquet or browning, and pour in two cupfuls of brown stock or water, and stir and cook for ten minutes, rub through a sieve, reheat and it is ready for use.

Egg Sauce.—If this sauce is to be served with boiled fish the foundation sauce should be made with some of the liquid in which the fish has been cooked, otherwise use white stock or milk. Make one cupful of white sauce quite hot, add to it a squeeze of lemon juice and seasonings to taste. Chop up two hard cooked eggs, add them, and make all thoroughly hot. Then remove the pan from the fire and stir in just before serving two tablespoonfuls of butter.

Sometimes the yolks of the eggs are rubbed through a sieve and the whites of the eggs cut in fine shreds or chopped, and this makes a better looking sauce, although it is a little more trouble to make. Some of the sieved yolk of egg may be used for decorating whatever the sauce is poured over.

Bread Sauce.—Put two cupfuls of milk into a double boiler, add one-half cupful of bread crumbs, and cook for fifty minutes, then add one onion stuck with four cloves, one teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of pepper, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, and two tablespoonfuls of butter, and cook until the onion is tender, then remove the onion and rub the sauce through a sieve. Reheat and serve hot with roast fowl or roast game.

Cheese Sauce.—Make one cupful of good white sauce quite hot in a small saucepan, mix in three tablespoonfuls of grated cheese gradually without allowing it to boil, add two tablespoonfuls of butter cut into small pieces, or three tablespoonfuls of cream just before serving.

Melted Butter Sauce.—Put four tablespoonfuls of sweet butter into a saucepan and stir it over a slow fire until melted. It should not lose its creamy appearance. Add one teaspoonful of lemon juice, salt, pepper and paprika to taste, and pour into a hot sauce-boat. More or less lemon juice may be used according to individual taste.

Serve with some vegetables such as asparagus, etc., also with boiled fish.

Chocolate Sauce.—Melt two squares of unsweetened chocolate with one-half cupful of hot water, then add four tablespoonfuls of sugar and two cupfuls of water. Moisten four tablespoonfuls of cornstarch with a little cold water or milk, add this to the chocolate, and stir until the sauce thickens. Remove from the fire and add one-half teaspoonful of vanilla extract.

Another Method.—Into the upper pan of a double boiler put one-fourth cupful of maple sugar, one yolk of egg, one cupful of milk, a pinch of salt, one tablespoonful of butter and two squares of grated chocolate or cocoa. Cook over hot water, stirring constantly until the spoon is coated, but do not allow the mixture to boil. Remove from the fire and add one-half teaspoonful each of vanilla and lemon extracts.

Orange Sauce.—Put one cupful of white stock or water into a saucepan, add four tablespoonfuls of chopped celery, one bay leaf and the grated rind of two oranges. Bring to the boil, simmer for twenty minutes, then strain. Return to the saucepan and add the strained juice of the oranges, bring to the boil again, then draw the saucepan to the side of the fire and add the yolks of two eggs mixed with two tablespoonfuls of milk or cream. Make thoroughly hot, but do not boil again, and stir in one teaspoonful of butter just before serving. This sauce is excellent served with roast poultry or roast game.

Nut Sauce, Savory.—A mixture of nuts may be used for this, such as almonds, peanuts and walnuts. Blanch them and chop or put them through a food chopper. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in a small saucepan and brown the nuts in this, then pound them to a paste in a bowl, moistening them with a little stock or water. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in another saucepan, stir in two tablespoonfuls of flour, when blended add one cupful of stock or water, or milk, add salt, pepper and paprika to taste, the nut paste, and simmer all together for five minutes. Then just before serving remove the pan from the fire and stir in the yolk of one egg beaten with two tablespoonfuls of cream.

Tartare Sauce.—Put one cupful of thick mayonnaise dressing into a bowl, add one tablespoonful of white sauce, one-half tablespoonful of chopped gherkins, one teaspoonful each of chopped capers, olives, parsley and tarragon, and a pinch of sugar, mix these well in and place in the refrigerator until required.

One tablespoonful of thick cream can be used in place of the white sauce.

Foamy Sauce.—Beat four tablespoonfuls of sweet butter until creamy, add one-fourth cupful of sugar and beat again, then add the beaten white of one egg and beat again, then add one-half cupful of boiling water and four tablespoonfuls of fruit juice, then stand the bowl over a pan of hot water, and beat until frothy. Serve at once.

Most Delicious Dishes from Just Plain Rice

HOW many of us appreciate the possibilities of rice—one of the most wholesome foods that grows? I have found so many exquisite dishes can be made of rice and meat or fish, or rice and fruit, that it seems to me it should have a much more frequent place in our daily fare.

Here, for instance, are two very simple but very delightful dishes in which rice is given an entirely new charm with Knox Sparkling Gelatine.

RICE PEACH CHARLOTTE

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 cup canned peaches, apricots or pineapple pressed through sieve
1/2 cup cold water 1/2 cup boiling water
2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice
Whites of 2 eggs 4 cupfuls of cooked rice
Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in boiling water. Add the sugar, and when dissolved add lemon juice. Strain, cool slightly and add peach or other fruit juice and pulp. When mixture begins to stiffen, beat (using a wire whisk) until light; then add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff, and beat together thoroughly. Line the sides of a buttered mold with the rice, pressing it in tightly. Pour the gelatine mixture slowly into the centre. When firm, turn on platter and serve with cream, whipped or plain, or a marshmallow or peach sauce.

Left-over coffee, combined with Knox Sparkling Gelatine, makes delicious Coffee Jelly, Coffee Spanish Cream or Mocha Sponge, recipes for which are found in my booklets.

SALMON RICE LOAF

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
3/4 cupful cold water 1 can of salmon
1 teaspoonful salt 1 cupful cooked rice
1/2 teaspoonful pepper 3/4 cupful milk
1 tablespoonful melted butter
Soften the gelatine in the cold water and dissolve by adding the hot milk. Add the seasonings, salmon, rice and butter. Pour into a wet mold and let stand until set. This may be served cold on lettuce as a salad or with a hot tomato sauce in place of meat at dinner. (Any other fish or meat may be used in place of salmon.)

Knox Sparkling Gelatine, being transparent, colorless and unflavored, may be used with all foods, fish and meat, as well as fruit and vegetables.

Editor Concerning Investments:

I should like to secure information on the Natural Gas, Light, Heat & Power Co., Ltd., Incorporated under the laws of the Province of Quebec. Capital, $500,000, divided into 500,000 shares of $1 each. Directors: T. H. Kite Powell, Esq., Springfield, Mass., U.S.A., President; Horace Davis, Esq., Advertising Manager, Montreal; Vice-President, I. M. Richard, N.P., St. Ours, P. Q.; Sec-Treasurer, D. McDonald, Esq., Montreal; Director, S. I. Dion, Esq., merchant, Montreal; Solicitors, Messrs. LaFlamme, Mitchell, Chenevert & Gallagher, Montreal.

Shares in this company were sold by the Union Securities, Ltd. of Yorkshire Building, 136 St. James St., Montreal, in the year 1915. Very favorable reports were issued from experts and engineers, as to the holdings of the company in the St. Hyacinthe County, some 30 miles from Montreal, which was stated to be an immense natural gas and oil field, but apparently nothing was ever done in the matter.

No reply was received to letters forwarded to Union Trust Company, and also to the firm of solicitors you name. This in itself is an indication that those who had to do with the selling of the stock in the first place are not any too anxious to disclose whatever may be the real position of affairs at the present time. We were, under the circumstances, obliged to make still another application to secure details. These are not very plentiful nor very satisfying. It appears that some work may have been done on the properties in St. Barnabie, Quebec, in 1916, but nothing has been done since. I am informed that the control of the company is now in Boston. The company ran into a good many troubles, and I think the directors themselves lost considerable money in one way and another over this deal. The books and accounts of the company were, at least up to 1919, in possession of Crown Trust Company, Montreal, and I will address that firm in an effort to secure a report showing how the company now stands.

Editor Concerning Investments:

I have been very much interested in your writings about investments, and know from personal experience that what you say is correct as regards brokers picturing vividly the large returns you may have by investing.

About a year ago, I bought some shares in Kirkland Lake Gold, selling at 70 then, but now down to 40, from H. B. Wills & Co. I was told to not delay buying as this stock would be up to one dollar soon, but it never went a point higher. Do you think this stock will soon advance or pay a dividend, or would it be advisable to sell it now? Do you think Hollinger would be a safe investment?

Last November, these brokers wrote advising me to invest in Mining Corporation, telling me that on one-third margin I would make 75 per cent. profit, but I did not invest and in a short time this stock fell from 1.65 to 1.00, having passed its dividend. I think you are doing a great deal of good by warning people to pay attention to these brokers, who have only their own interests at heart. E. M. S.

As a general thing, results secured by women who dabble in speculative issues, are not satisfactory. There is perhaps no valid reason why a woman cannot use a small surplus, left over after her main funds have gone into investment issues, for speculative purposes, but if so she should make very close inquiries as to what she buys, and whom she deals with. As to Kirkland Lake, it is an open question whether you should hold or sell. The prospect for gold producers looks somewhat promising, and possibly you might find a better market in the spring for your stock than there is at present.

Hornpayne, Ont.

Editor Concerning Investments:

Would you give me what information you can about the L. R. Steel Service Corporation, Ltd. Offices are in the Royal Bank Building, Toronto. Several people here, including ourselves, have bought stock in same, and have since heard that they are a very poor firm, so I would like to know if it is true, as we have not made our full payment yet. W. A.

I assume that you have been offered stock in the L. R. Steel Co., Incorporated. This company, with its Delaware charter, owns stock in L. R. Steel Company, Limited (of Canada), but at the same time there has been no stock of the latter company for sale. Perhaps as time goes on, and if L. R. Steel does not make the glittering success of his enterprise as calculated, the company may sell stock in L. R. Steel, Limited, in order to get some cash into the treasury. Personally, I can see no attraction whatever in the Steel stock, nor in any stock which has the name L. R. Steel attached to it. I do not consider that the brief and limited experience which L. R. Steel had with ten and fifteen cent stores in the United States, at all entitles him to enter Canada, and start out to promote a large and ambitious venture in the way he has been doing. Who is it that is financing the expensive advertising which the Steel Companies are giving themselves? The shareholders, of course. The new sites, on the best corners of the cities of the West, which are being selected and bought for the L. R. Steel Company, or else leased for them at a large rental, are costing the company a lot of money. It is said that, in the first place, it cost the L. R. Steel Company 17½ per cent. to get its stock sold, but I do not believe that the Steel stock is being sold on any such margin. I would not be at all surprised if the fact were found to be that the expense of selling the shares, and the publicity, and the banquets, and the flowers, etc., would run to twenty-five per cent. of the money that came in. However, that is only a surmise. But as the company is young, and has not really made any earnings, it cannot be said with what success the company will operate. The methods employed, however, do not inspire confidence—I would not buy the stock.

MY Dear Club Members:
I like to remember, and to look forward to, the smiles of April far more than to its showers. That you do, too, is shown in your letters and your stories sent to me for this month.

A Canadian Club, a young folks' club, it is good to see the helpful interest, and feel the spirit of cheeriness. Ours is a "get-acquainted-club," too, for, although our homes dot all Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we seek to know each other as well as if we were schoolmates, or that we each lived "just next door."

Our first "Spring Flowers," was sent to us by Ruth Dingwall. Truly, wild flowers are best, Ruth, for the gathering of them takes us where all is freshest and most beautiful.

Jack Holmes sends us a story that pictures the first flowers of spring as they come peeping out almost before winter has left us. They are our earliest visitors, and, because of that, more welcome than many gayer blossoms that come later.

Helen M. Grant takes us right to the woods where we can see the wild flowers together: It is a story of pleasant things in pleasant places, and we find, as she tells us, that "The coming of the spring flowers, is one of Nature's many joys."

It is a delightful legend you told us of, Betty Pidcock. Fairies, flowers, and springtime go together—don't they? I will look forward to receiving more stories from you, Betty.

"The First Flowers of Spring," sent by John Sowden, is good. You

"An Old Tree," taken by J. Fraser Morris, Canmore, Alta. On the top of the tree is the nest of an osprey, or fish hawk, and, if you look carefully, you will see the bird himself alighting on the nest with a stick in his mouth.

I enjoyed your letter, Marion K. Cameron, and am glad you enjoy our club page, and that you have decided to join us.

Your story tells us of "The First Flowers of Spring," and you tell us, too: "Every spring the children at our school gather wild flowers, and send them to the Sick Children's Hospital, where they help to bring joy to the sick boys and girls—after all, what would this world be without flowers?"

might have made it just a little longer though, John. Your story is brightly told, and you have the correct idea of construction. Do let me hear from you again soon.

Arthur Cullum's "The Flowers of Spring," is a prize-winner, and we congratulate you, Arthur. The story is splendidly told.

"The Coming of the Summer Birds," was sent to us by Lucy Ireland. This is not so much the coming of the birds themselves as of their songs. It tells how each voices the joy of the spring-time, brings news of coming showers, and heralds each new dawn. It is bright and joyous, and has been a pleasure to read.

Your letter, "Kitty" Dawes, I read with pleasure, and am so glad you liked your prize. I love to get your letters. Your story, too, of "The Coming of the Summer Birds," holds much of interest, and, as you say, "once again our trees are filled with the songs which delight our ears as well as our hearts."

You have given us some splendid description in your story, Grace Swayze. There are too few of us who know much of the life and habits of our feathered friends.

I enjoyed your story, Adelaide Lockhart, and I can quite understand how hard it must have been to stay inside when the birds were singing, and all Nature was in so joyous a mood.

Your essay on the summer birds, Velma Zwick, is a most interesting one. You introduce each early arrival, and even tell us what he has for his dinner. A most important thing to know, too, for our welcome to the birds depends much on what grain and fruit they take in payment for their summer songs.

Elsie Lebreton has written of our early birds, beginning with our friend the Robin. She has given us much information, not only about the birds themselves, but about their nests, in a most interesting way, and came very near being the prize-winner. Write me again soon, Elsie. Won't you?

You tell us of "The Coming of the Summer Birds," Harry Lane; but, your story was too short. I am sure you could tell us much more if you took a little more time, for what you have sent is very good. I am sure you love the Robin and the Blue Bird, and all that their song means to us. I will look for your story this month. Be sure and send it.

"The Coming of the Summer Birds" is told us by Stella Silverstein. I think you must like the little birds best, Stella. Your description of the home life of some of the feathered people is as interesting as it is true.

Jessie Swayze sends us a story of our summer birds, and how each one should be a welcome visitor because it does so much more good than harm. Your description is accurate, and your story is well arranged. I shall look forward to the reading of your next essay.

"The Coming of the Summer Birds," by Harrison Murphy, is a prize-winner. Your story is especially good, and I know the Club will enjoy it. Congratulations from us all, Harrison. And your letter, that you sent with your story, was a real boy's letter, and I did enjoy it. Won't you send me another?

A pretty view of "An Old Tree," of an orchard with the ox-eye daisies in bloom, comes from Lillian Coulter. It makes one wish for summer flower-gathering days.

An exceptionally fine tree-study is one shown in the "snap" sent in by Russell Aikens. It is certainly a well chosen subject for photographic work. It is a splendid bend in the road. Why did you not send it in last month? I should like to see more of your "snapshots," and have you continue as an active member of our Club.

Alice M. Partridge has sent us a snapshot, a quaint study of trees and a smiling little girl. Is it you, Alice? Let me know. Won't you?

I enjoyed your letter, J. Fraser Morris, and the "snap," too, which is the prize-winner. Let me hear from you again.

I think that this has been perhaps the friendliest month that we have had. Our club page is our meeting-place, and your stories and your letters show the interest you feel in making and keeping our club "a club of friends."

Your sincere friend,
BERTHA E. GREEN.

THE COMING OF SUMMER BIRDS. (Prize Story.)

DURING the latter part of March, and the earlier part of April, when our old stand-by, the sun, has begun to soften the features of cold winter, we begin to see our summer song-birds.

Perhaps the most welcome of all our pretty visitors, and also one with which we are all familiar, is that little red-breasted friend, the robin. He is one of the first to arrive, and often is here when the snow is on the ground. In fact, I remember seeing a pair on the seventeenth of March, one year, carolling as happily as they would in summer. As the spring blends into summer, we are surrounded by a host of our little friends, who seem never to have a care in the world, or if they do, disguise it so well that we never hear about it.

Soon if we take the liberty to peep into a robin's nest we will find three or four oval-shaped eggs, sky-blue in color. We cannot examine them closely, however, for the mother bird is imploring us in the bird language, not to touch them. After a few weeks we notice that the mother is bringing grubs to the nest, and from it we hear impatient little squawks. After an anxious period, while the little birds are growing their feathers, the

by VAIN JANE

ONE of those questions that is always "vexed," and upon which there never seems to be general agreement, to wit, at what age a woman reaches the greatest perfection of her beauty, seems to have been settled once and for all by a society of women in Tarbes, that lovely old town in the south of France, which calls itself by the romantic name of "The Charm Club." The Charm Club, we are told, has a very large membership composed of women both in society and business; it never holds a meeting and its members are not known to one another. It is held together, however, by the literature which it produces, and this literature, dealing, of course, with the secret of attaining loveliness, is under promise of the members, forbidden to the eyes of men! Thrilling, isn't it? And you will probably ask how this condition can be enforced. "The information is kept from the general male public," explains Countess de Tavernay, who is head of the Club, "by an interesting method. We publish a series of booklets which are sent to our members.

"Part 1 must be returned before Part 2 can be received; Part 8 before receiving Part 9, and so on. Each recipient must make a solemn statement that no male eyes have read it, or explain the circumstances in case of failure. In the latter case advice will be given for the future. Money is no object. It is for the French family!"

One of the great contentions of The Charm Club, as we have suggested, is that woman must live to two score years or more before she attains the triumph of her flowering. One of the proofs advanced is that the intuition of the very young man in this matter is unerring—the youth of seventeen, with senses fresh and keen, begins with his grande passion for some woman of forty. It is traditional from Candide to Henry Esmond. On the other hand, the greatest enemy of the woman of forty, is the man of forty, who sees in her the shadow of his own degeneracy, forgets that the wear and tear of the past ten years have not been hers, and turns to the girl of twenty-three, that he may not be reminded of his graceless ageing. According to Countess de Tavernay, it is at this age of perfection that husbands and wives too often turn their backs on one another.

When asked, are women the age they look, the Countess denied it.

"No, the woman of forty is positively loveliest. Painters of voluptuous subjects, have always been reproached for 'doing chic' because they partially age their models. Exactly! To attain the perfection of sensual beauty, such painters enlarge rotundities, exaggerate curves and arrive at an unearthly charm by giving the nymph of seventeen a whole set of outlines which she ought not to have for ten or fifteen years yet. What is this but glorifying the woman of forty? The empty face of seventeen is added to flatter the man of forty, who generally buys the picture!"

It is a most interesting and consoling theory, consoling if we happen ourselves to be forty, and consoling if we are not yet forty, but some day expect to be. According to this original specialist in loveliness, the age of forty may be anything we care to make it—"the terrible forties," if panic seizes us, the "ridiculous forties" if we are not careful, but the "splendid forties" if we care to make them so! If any of you, dear ladies of the Looking Glass, should stumble upon the secret of The Charm Club, I hope you will be generous and divulge it to us all.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GERTRUDE.—Your manner of addressing me is quite "proper" and the one I like best, Miss Gertrude, so you and I have made a good start. Though you have only received one copy of the Home Journal up to the present time, I hope you will continue to find plenty to interest you and assure you we will always be "at home" any time you care to call at The Looking Glass. I am sending you the name of the cream that you request and also the formula for a lotion which should correct the condition you describe.

MAGANETAWAN.—"Flu" has been responsible for the wrecking of the appearance of so many people that I have a special dread of it and am only thankful that it seems to have run its course. You are fortunate that two wrinkles are the only evidence of its having attacked you, my friend from Maganetawan, and they, after all, should not be difficult to erase. Correct massage and a tissue food should accomplish this. Certainly at twenty-eight your flesh should not show signs of flabbiness. I wonder if you take sufficient exercise? There is nothing like walking to make the flesh firm—long, brisk walks at a five-mile-an-hour pace should show very early results.

MARGARET.—If I followed my inclination, Miss Margaret, I would scold you for a silly child! The idea of cutting off the sides of your pretty hair to get an effect that could have been obtained by a manner of hairdressing. There is only one thing for you to do now, since your cut hair will never grow, so long as you are curling and back-combing it, and that is to buy little switches of hair to pin on the sides. A hair-dresser was showing them to me just the other day and I was astonished to hear that a great many people wore them. Of course, I don't admire them—in fact I never admire what is known as "false" hair—but they will give your own hair an opportunity to grow that it will never otherwise have. I think any reliable hair dealer should be able to supply you with these, but make sure you match your own dark locks so that they will not obviously appear to be "store made."

NOEL.—Yours is a charming name; were you a Christmas baby, and did Santa Claus bring you instead of the stork? I am sorry you have chilblains, poor child—I remember how I used to suffer with them in winters past, when bobsleighing, skating and out-of-doors fun were my principal interests, and the hours spent in the school-room, greatly repented periods of penance. You doubtless know they are caused by lowered vitality, or severe cold and too quick heating of chilled feet. When the foot begins to itch, which is the first sign, it should be massaged gently with olive oil or any grease that you have on hand. Don't put the feet into hot water, put them into cold water which may be gradually warmed. Be sure that the feet are perfectly dried after bathing. Wear woolen stockings, not such a trial these days when they are considered correct for smart wear. If the chilblains should amount to frost bite, paint them with equal parts of camphor and belladonna liniment.

Cutex Sets come in three different sizes. Prices 60c, $1.50, $3.00

Lovely nails— with no fuss or bother

In one convenient set—everything you need to attain them

First, the Cuticle Remover.

Dip the end of an orange stick wrapped in cotton into the bottle of Cutex and work around the nail base, pushing back the cuticle gently. Rinse the fingers. The dead cuticle will simply wipe off.

Then the Nail White.

This is to remove the stains that will persist, and give the nail tips that immaculate whiteness without which one's nails never seem freshly manicured. Squeeze the paste under the nails directly from the tube, which is made with a pointed tip.

Finally the Polish.

A delightful, jewel-like shine is obtained by using first the paste and then the powder, and burnishing by brushing the nails lightly across the palm of the hand. Or you can get an equally lovely lustre, instantaneously and without burnishing by giving them a light coat of the Liquid Polish.

TEN minutes for a manicure! But that's quite time enough when one has everything one can possibly need all together in one set—a set that makes manicuring simpler than you ever dreamed.

No cuticle scissors! The modern way of manicuring has done away with the tedious and dangerous business of cuticle-cutting altogether. Instead—just a dip with the orange stick into the little bottle you will find in the box, a dab around the base of the nails and under the tips, a rinsing of the fingers, and the ugly, dead cuticle simply wipes away.

It is all so quick, so easy, so pleasant—right up to the final polish! Really, Cutex has made manicuring a rest and relaxation instead of a vexation and a burden!

Every woman is taken with a Cutex Set the moment she sees it. The smartness and originality of its black and rose color scheme makes her want it, just because it will be a joy to the eye on her toilet table. And every little necessity is so handily put up. Everything right there—ready to come out just as you need it.

Three different sizes —which set will you have?

Cutex Sets come in three sizes. The smallest, at 60c., is called appropriately "The Compact" as it contains all the manicuring essentials in the smallest possible space. In it are trial size packages of Cuticle Remover, Nail White and Paste and Cake Polishes. Tucked away in their own little compartment, you will also find emery boards, flexible steel file and orange stick.

The "Traveling" Set, at $1.50, is just what you have always wanted for your toilet case—whether for little week-end trips or for long journeys. You feel proud of it in the dressing room of a sleeping car or in your hostess' guest room. It has a full supply of all the preparations, and larger size nail file, emery boards and orange stick.

The most elaborate Set is the "Boudoir" at $3.00, a real luxury and delight. Six different manicure preparations are found in it, and a nail buffer as well as the file, emery boards and orange stick.

Get your Cutex Set today. After your first manicure, you will wonder how you ever got along without it. It will really be a revelation to you to find how simple it makes manicuring. And you will be amazed to see how lovely your nails look with smooth, even rims, immaculate nail tips and the exquisite lustre the Cutex Polishes give. With a Cutex Set, only ten minutes spent on the nails regularly once or twice a week will keep them always in perfect condition. Each article in the set can be had separately for 35 cents.

mother soon will be seen with some new little robins on the lawn, either picking up grubs, or having a hard tussle with an obstinate worm who refuses to leave his home.

How many of you have seen the pretty little humming bird, as he flits from blossom to blossom of some lilac bush? He is one of our prettiest as well as one of our most brilliant colored birds. With his green, scarlet, yellow, and blue coat, his delicate bill and his transparent wings, he is indeed a very pretty sight. I have seen several of these little birds and every one seemed more beautiful than the last one.

One of my most intimate bird friends was a tiny house-wren who had made his home at our house. Every year the little chap put in an appearance with his shy little mate, and the two of them singing to each other on a summer's evening, were indeed a pretty sight. They have an exceptionally sweet little song, and many a time have I listened to the two as they sang their morning song over and over again, just from pure delight of being alive.

The eggs of the house-wren are very tiny, being about the size of a bean, dull white in color and speckled with brown.

There are many other birds which are here in summer, but these I have tried to describe, I find the most interesting, and when they have gone in the fall, I greatly miss my pretty little friends and look forward as eagerly to their arrival in the spring as I would to that of a greatly loved friend.

THE FLOWERS OF SPRING. (Prize Story.)

SPRING, spring, spring! how can anyone awake on a lovely morning with the sun flooding one's room, listening to the robins merrily chirping and the sparrows twittering their spring anthem and not know that spring is coming?

The sky is blue and cloudless, while the sun's steady rays melt the last speck of snow. The sap is running, and all the trees are putting forth their dainty green buds. Even the river seems to know that spring is on her way, for it leaps and gurgles on the way to the lake.

The garden, which but a short month ago seemed dead, is now full of life. The birds are singing, the buds are bursting, but, best of all, the snowdrop is poking her white-capped head above the ground. This sweet flower is the first to arrive. It is very pretty, with its white bell-shaped head, and long, waxy, green leaves, while its perfume is as nice as anyone could wish for.

In some warm and sunny spot, long green shoots announce that the crocus and daffodil will not be long.

A few weeks later, one really must snatch a few hours from the daily routine, and take a walk through the woods, to find if the woodland flowers are also doing their part to herald the coming of spring. If you walk along the woodland trails one is almost sure to come upon lovely purple violets nestled beneath the sheltering banks. A few weeks later a wilder violet will make its appearance. These are a paler blue than the garden violets, and they have no perfume.

There are several varieties of these flowers to be found, and prominent among these is the Dog-Tooth. These are very pretty, being very large, and of a bell-shape; the leaves are very much like lily-of-the-valley, only they are spotted. They come in yellow, white, or mauve shades, much like their smaller sisters.

I think of all the wild flowers I like the Trillium is the prettiest. Its pure white color and lily-like appearance make one think of Easter lilies. They are sometimes found with a deep rose coloring, but I like the pure white best.

We mustn't forget the Hepatica with its queer leaves and furry stems. This flower is very dainty in its gown of mauve or white. It is followed by the anemone, bloodroot and Love Apple.

One could almost write forever on the many kinds of flowers, and though I have written nearly three pages, I have mentioned very few garden flowers. Wild ones appeal to me the most of any.

Still one cannot help mentioning the lovely lily-of-the-valley, or the tulips, and hyacinths, and many others. But I will have to end my discussion as the summer blooms will soon be arriving; methinks that even now I can catch the perfume of roses.

WHITECAP, THE FISHERMAN.

By Bertha E. Green.

THE man who paddles the canoe for me said that he knew all about it, and, what was more would show me. That is how it happened. We were on our way to Bar Pond, where I was to see wood ducks. It is a trip of several miles from the foot of the long inlet to the channel that leads into the Long Slough, from where there is a portage to Bar Pond. It was early in the year for canoeing, but a season to see much of interest in the haunts of the feathered folk.

An opportunity to visit the home of the handsomest of the ducks was one not to be missed, even at the cost of a possible wetting.

We skirted the shore, often with the water so shallow that the canoe poked a nose way through the reed-beds. We passed from point to point that marked the small bays, and turning inshore, entered the mouth of a narrow cut, or channel. The channel broadened several times into almost big-enough-to-turn-around-in lakes, closely bordered by wild rice. We were now in the duck meadows, the wild rice-beds that stretched far ahead of us to the border of the distant, shadowy pine forest.

The channel opened into a long lagoon, the water shallowing towards the far end over a bottom of clear, yellow sand. From here we had planned to start the rather short walk to Bar Pond, where I was to see the promised Wood Ducks.

Some distance down the lagoon we debarked and put on long rubber boots, in preparation for a wet tramp. The man who paddles the canoe now drew my attention to the shallows at the far end of the lagoon. A sunlit morning, almost without wind, left these little inland waters in mirror smoothness, but in the shallows there were ripples on the surface, and an occasional splash that sent out widening circles.

"Golden Carp," said the canoe-man. The sandy shallows of the lagoon were a spawning-ground for carp. We could see them moving here and there, nudging each other from favored spots, with the water only deep enough to cover their backs. A flip of a tail often broke the surface, and sometimes a big fellow would leap clear, his scale armour of green and gold-bronze flashing in the sunlight.

I had forgotten all about the Wood Ducks, when the man who paddles the canoe called to me in a whisper:

"Hunch down and watch."

I "hunched," and, directed by a pointing finger, saw the reason for the whisper and the "hunch."

"Whitecap, the Fisherman," whispered the canoe-man.

About a hundred feet above the water, a large bird was circling, eagle-like wings spread five or six feet from tip to tip. The wings were dark, the back also of brown, with a white breast, and a white-topped head, which doubtless led the canoe-man to call the bird Whitecap.

A black splash covered each eye, running back into the dark feathers of the neck, and a strong, hooked bill placed him for me. It was an Osprey, a Fish Hawk, and this was his hunting-ground.

He circled slowly, keeping an ever-watchful eye on the waters below him. Suddenly he stopped flying forward, and remained for a moment, his broad wings beating up and down. In a second or two, the wings closed like a knife, and the hawk plunged recklessly downward. His strong legs were stretched below him with powerful claws extended. In this manner he struck the water, but, quick as he had been, the carp he had planned for had moved to safety.

The Osprey rose quickly, at the same time uttering a harsh, piercing whistle. Whitecap was hungry, angry, and impatient. He was, however, also experienced and wise. A few strokes of his strong wings carried him again to a height of some thirty yards or more, where he continued his circling watch.

Again he checked his flight; there was a second's hovering, a drop, and a splash. The beating of wide-fanned wings, and Whitecap rose again, a large carp grasped in his talons.

We watched the Fisherman as he winged a somewhat labored flight almost over our heads.

"Gone to find a dead tree to use as a breakfast-room," said the man who paddles the canoe, "likely the one at the mouth of the Cut."

"Let us go and see," I suggested eagerly.

"He would hear us before we got there," said the canoe-man, "he doesn't approve of visitors at meal times."

"Besides," he added, "Whitecap has no table manners worth speaking of. You have seen him where he looks his best—hunting. Come on and see the Wood Ducks."

So we started our "squishy" tramp to Bar Pond, and above the wild rice I saw the crimson flash of my first red-winged blackbird of the year.

It is as unnecessary as it is unpleasant. Sani-Flush will clean your closet bowl with scarcely any effort on your part. And it will clean it more thoroughly than you can do it by any other means—so thoroughly, in fact, that disinfectants are not necessary. Sprinkle a little Sani-Flush into the bowl according to the directions on the can. Flush. Then watch the result. Markings, stains, incrustations will all disappear, leaving the bowl and hidden trap as spotlessly white as new. Sani-Flush cannot harm the plumbing.

The Official Guardian Act of Alberta

By ELIZABETH BAILEY PRICE

THIS is an age when on every hand we are told "The children are the greatest asset of the State." This is not a glibly oft-repeated high-sounding phrase, for more and more the State is accepting the responsibility for its "Greatest Asset."

We have in this rapidly-revolutionizing country free education; we have a tremendous movement to conserve child life through governmental public health departments; we have the direct effort of the State to preserve the home by "Mothers' Pensions"; we have homes for orphans and neglected children and in Alberta, which is famed already because it is in the vanguard of progressive legislation, we have the three-year-old "Official Guardian Act," an act whereby in the absence of any near relative willing and competent to act, an officer of the Government known as Official Guardian, may act as guardian of children whose parents have died, and also as Administrator of estates of missing person or persons serving a term of imprisonment of not less than three years.

Other provinces have laws governing the property rights of infants (infants meaning children under twenty-one years of age) but there is no province that has the extended jurisdiction over infants as to their personal welfare as in Alberta, where the Official Guardian not only administers the estates but acts in an advisory capacity in everything that pertains to the education, the health, etc., of these wards of the State.

This Act was introduced in April, 1917, by the Hon. C. R. Mitchell. He explained that the necessity for such a bill arose from the fact that in many cases where parents had died, leaving their estates to be administered by strangers, the assets of such estates had been dissipated through fraud, improvidence or lack of business judgment, with the result that there was nothing left for the children who should have been provided for during their minority and receive a substantial amount on becoming of age. Many instances of this kind were cited and it was stated that especially amongst the foreign population, estates in many cases were never administered, the assets being taken in charge by some surviving relatives and the children formed out to look after themselves as best they could.

The Act provided for the establishment of the office of Official Guardian, to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor, such Official Guardian to be a barrister or solicitor of not less than five years standing. He was given power to act as guardian of infants; to act

MR. A. G. BROWNING
Deputy Attorney-General of Alberta (Official Guardian).

as guardian of any infant made a ward of the court and generally do such other acts as an official guardian might be authorized to do by the rules of the court, by order of a judge or by order of the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council. He was empowered also to act as custodian of the property of missing persons, also persons who were serving a term of imprisonment for a period of three years or more.

The Act was amended at a later session to provide that in every case where application was made for probate of will, or Letters of Administration, in which any infant was interested, particulars of such application, should be sent to the Official Guardian, so that he may, if the interests of the estate demand it, be represented on such application. All papers in connection with such applications are personally perused by the Official Guardian, and wherever the interests of the infants affected, appear to warrant his investigation, the provisions of the Act are taken advantage of. The additional cost to the estate is very slight, and the Judges generally have expressed the opinion that the operation of the Act has in many instances resulted in great benefit to all concerned.

After passing the Act, the Deputy Attorney-General, Mr. A. G. Browning, was appointed Official Guardian. While there is no direct connection between the office of Official Guardian and that of the department of the Attorney-General, the work of the office is being carried on under the general instructions of the Attorney-General without any additional staff, entirely within the department and without any additional cost to the province.

Generally speaking, the operations of the Act have exceeded all expectations and were found to be very beneficial both in the way of assisting the executors and administrators in their work of managing estates and also protecting infants.

THERE were at the end of June one hundred and twenty-six children of whose estates the Official Guardian was in charge. In many cases these are in the care of their mothers; in some cases they are placed in church schools; one is being trained as a nurse; seventy are in private homes in the Province; others with relatives, and in all cases these are from time to time visited by the inspectors of the Neglected Children's Department, whose advice and co-operation has been very much appreciated and been of great help.

No Corns To-day

Unless folks let them stay

Millions of people nowadays keep completely free from corns.

At the first sign of a corn they use Blue-jay—the liquid or the plaster. The pain then stops. In a little while the whole corn loosens and comes out.

People who pare corns keep them. People who use old treatments—harsh, unscientific—do themselves injustice.

There is now a scientific corn ender. A famous chemist perfected it. This world-famed laboratory supplies it through druggists everywhere.

It is at your call. A touch will apply it. Its use seals the fate of a corn.

At least 20 million corns yearly are now ended in this easy, gentle way. Apply it to one corn to-night. Watch what it does.

East Leicester—"Making over Garments" and combining material and colors, were two timely subjects at the January meeting. Roll Call—How to make our Institutes a success—and Community singing, added to the meeting.

Falmouth—School Sanitation is a subject of study. The Children's Aid Society have also awakened the interest of the Institute.

Great Village is enjoying Community singing.

Habitant plans for starting a small circulating library have been made.

Indian Point is interested in their school. The members find the Rural Science Bulletin interesting and helpful.

Lawrencetown remembers those who are shut in by sending them pots of primroses. They are also interested in School Improvement.

Lunenburg—Public Health and Child Welfare are subjects of interest. This Institute has a charitable committee which does excellent work.

Mahone—Public Health and Boy Scout work are subjects of greatest interest to this Institute at present.

Martock and Windsor Forks—Always interested in their schools, have recently sent a contribution to the European Famine Fund.

New Germany has profited by a most valuable talk on First Aid given by a local doctor.

Oxford is interested in Canadian authors. A committee has been appointed to visit sick members.

Port Maitland—Community work and school improvements are their activities.

Port Williams is interested in current events. A contribution has been made to the European Famine Fund.

West Gore—Public Health is a subject of interest. "Health Habits" was an interesting topic at a recent meeting.

Williamston has a sewing club to sew for needy in the neighborhood.

West Brook and Halfway River—Music was an attractive subject at their January meeting. The life and work of different musicians was discussed. They are also interested in co-operating with the public health nurse in their county.

A THRIVING INSTITUTE.

WOODSTOCK, New Brunswick, has an Institute which is doing excellent work. The president is Mrs. Charles Comben. Recently this Institute sent an order of over thirty dollars to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the order including brooms and aprons. The members are planning to furnish a room in the Nurses' Home and money raised at social evenings will be used for that purpose. The March entertainment was a lecture on a very interesting subject by Judge Carleton, not only to Institute members but the public in general.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTES AND RURAL EDUCATION.

THE laws of Quebec are such that women are not given a very active part in the making of laws pertaining to our schools, says Mrs. Armitage. Nevertheless, rural education, better schools and "back to the land" policy are outstanding lines of activity with the Women's Institutes of the province. The attitude of this organization is not that of destructive criticism, but to see where the Women's Institutes can lend their energies and co-operate to the end that every child in Canada shall have a fair chance to secure an education under conditions which make for the best mental, normal and physical development.

Provision should be made for education along practical lines such as agriculture, domestic science, manual training, etc., and every school board should be induced to take advantage of government aid in this respect. The school curriculum should be adapted to the needs of boys and girls who wish to apply their knowledge to the ordinary activities of the home, the farm, the shop and the business world.

The following article is taken from the "Journal of Agriculture," England, and shows that Women's Institutes in the Motherland (of which Her Majesty Queen Mary is a member) are working along similar lines:

"The improvement of the social and intellectual life of the village is essential for the maintenance of a vigorous rural population. Unless country life provides more avenues than are open at present for the employment of leisure-time, it is certain that the drift to the towns, which was so noticeable in the past, will continue. In order to prevent this exodus to the towns the great need of the village is the improvement of the social life of the countryside. The rural problem is essentially a problem of re-creating the rural community, of developing new social traditions and a new culture. What is needed is to establish in the village a living nucleus of communal activity which will serve as a centre for the satisfaction of the social and intellectual needs of the people. Such a nucleus is the village Institute. The Institute should be the headquarters of organized local activities; pig clubs and bee clubs, and agricultural and horticultural societies of one sort and another, adult schools, and classes arranged by voluntary organizations, Women's Institutes, schools for mothers, chess clubs, and so forth, should be encouraged to use the Institutes; and one or more rooms, as may be necessary, should be provided for the purposes of their meetings. The Institute should contain a hall large enough for dances, cinema shows, concerts, plays, public lectures and exhibitions. At the Institute there should be a public library and local museum. If arrangements can be made for games and sports, so much the better. The Institute, in a word, should be a centre of educational, social and recreational activity."

NATIONAL NOTES.

Applications for the Federal pin may be made at any time to Miss Eliza Campbell, the national treasurer R.F.D. No. 6, Fredericton, N.B. Every member of the Women's Institutes in Canada is entitled to wear this pin. Each demonstrator or lecturer who goes out should carry a supply with her. The badges are a reproduction of the coat of arms of Canada. They have been greatly admired and experts have pronounced them the most beautiful and characteristic of their kind in Canada.

Miss Della Saunders, who has been superintendent in Prince Edward Island, has taken the place of Miss May Chute, the superintendent in Quebec, who has retired from that office. Miss Saunders began her work in Quebec, January 1st.

The Women's Institutes are helping very materially in Alberta, in the work of putting on short courses for the wives of the soldier settlers. These have been arranged to last ten days in the centres of Red Deer, Lethbridge, Peace River, Grande Prairie, Calgary and Edmonton. In Edmonton and Peace River the W. I. has taken full responsibility of providing billets for 250 in the first place and fifty in the latter. In Red Deer and Calgary, the W. I. is working through central committees. Short courses in cooking and canning are being provided from the central office.

A letter has come from Miss Ruth Beale, of the Australian Department of Hy. W. Peabody and Co., New York, enquiring about Women's Institutes. She states that she is very much interested in the condition of farmers' wives in Australia, and has been turning over in her mind a means whereby the betterment of these conditions could be accomplished. Miss Beale is crossing Canada and will gather information on her way through.

It was decided to have a handicrafts exhibition at the coming National biennial convention of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, which will be held in Edmonton, at the University of Alberta, on June 20th to 28th, followed by that of the Alberta Women's Institutes and Girls' Clubs, which will be held from June 27th to July 2nd.

The report of the Women's Institutes of Ontario, for 1919, has just been published and it is a very creditable book for it is not only handsomely bound but contains some one hundred and forty-one pages of valuable reading matter on the work of the Ontario Women's and Girls' Institutes. During that year there were three Ontario conventions, Eastern, Western and central, while in 1921, in all probability, there will be six, which shows how splendidly the Ontario W. I. has grown. Reports of addresses by national W. I. workers, such as Mrs. William Todd, Orillia, Mrs. Arthur Murphy, the national president, Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E., Miss Ethel Chapman, Miss Emily Guest and Mr. George Putnam have been reproduced verbatim and are well worth keeping.

Members of the Federated Women's Institutes, the Dominion over, will be proud and pleased to know that the books of their national president, Mrs. Arthur Murphy, "Janey Canuck," are in such demand that "Open Trails," and "Janey Canuck in the West" are being brought out in the Wayfarers' Library in editions of 30,000. Mrs. Murphy has the distinction of being the only Canadian author, whose books are placed in this library which contains only books of recognized literary merit.

The F.W.I. Board of Directors endorsed the Dominion Chautauqua, believing it to be an educative and forward movement worthy of every support.

Mrs. William Todd, Orillia, President of the Ontario Women's Institutes, and Vice President of the National Federation, has been appointed to represent the rural women of Canada on the Advisory Committee of the Dominion Council of Health.

The Alberta Women's Institute stood solidly behind the Prohibition Referendum in that province, when the question at issue was the inter-provincial shipment of intoxicating liquors. They provided speakers, canvassed for votes and the registering of voters and helped furnish local committees with funds.

Prince Edward Island Women's Institutes were welcomed into the Dominion Federation at the Board of Directors' meeting, held in Montreal recently. Mrs. Della Saunders, the Superintendent, and Mrs. John McGuigan of Hope River, being the representatives of that province.

Mrs. Alfred Watt has compiled a manual on "Practices and Principles of the Women's Institute," which has been approved by the National Federation.

Short courses in Household Science have been held in the French speaking districts of New Brunswick, these courses consisting of daily classes in cookery, sewing and nursing. All classes were well attended and a keen interest shown in the work. Following the short courses, the Department of Agriculture sent out a nurse who is visiting the individual Institutes of the Western half of the Province, doing follow-up work in Child Welfare. A Household Science demonstrator is visiting also the individual Institutes of the Eastern half of the Province, teaching food values, proper methods of cooking and preservation of vegetables.

Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E., who was instrumental in introducing Women's Institutes in England, with such success that they now number over sixteen hundred, has been appointed Chairman of the Advisory Board of the Women's Institutes of British Columbia.

At the first biennial convention of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, held in Toronto last year, an alliance was culminated with the Women's Institutes of Great Britain. Word has been received from the Bristol National Federation, that they look favorably on an International Federation.

Institute members all are proud of their motto "For Home and Country." This originated in the mind of the National Convenor of Agriculture, Mrs. Laura Rose Stephen, of Huntingdon, Quebec.

Miss Emily Guest, National Corresponding Secretary, resigned her position and will take the Convenorship of the Committee on National Events. The new secretary, whose appointment was left in the hands of a committee, will be chosen from Edmonton, Alta., where the president resides.

Quebec Women's Institutes, although chiefly rural women, and summer being the busy season, report that their work has been kept up well. Miss Chute, superintendent of Women's Institutes from Macdonald College, spent several days in Stanstead County the latter part of August, where she organized new Institutes at Ayer's Cliff and Hatley and visited the branches already operating in that county. Miss Chute has the sympathetic touch which endears her to all with whom she comes in contact. Her helpful addresses and personal intercourse are sure to stimulate those working "for Home and Country."

HELPING GIRL GUIDES.

FROM Mrs. H. G. Whitman, captain, comes this account of how the Emerson Women's Institute (Manitoba), helped in the Girl Guide Movement.

The Girl Guides of Emerson, Manitoba, organized into a company of about thirty, under the leadership of a captain and lieutenant, responsible to the Women's Institutes for the company.

Girl Guide training includes Homecraft, Physical Development, Woodcraft, and Discipline. To instruct in all these branches, which meant learning them also, seemed too difficult for two people possessing only the training of Public School teachers and handicapped by school work in one instance and housework in the other. We desired, therefore, to enlist the services of the Women's Institute

ROYAL YEAST CAKES

Good home made bread is the finest food on earth, and the wife that is a good bread maker is a real helpmate to the bread winner. Bread is the one food that perfectly combines in itself all the elements that give strength to the body. Children who eat lots of good home made bread thrive the best—they never get sick from eating good bread. Bread making is a simple operation. Bread made in the home with Royal Yeast Cakes possesses a greater degree of nourishment, and will keep fresh longer than that made with any other.

Scientists highly recommend yeast as a food and as a corrective agent for certain functional disarrangements, attributed to poor blood conditions. Soak a cake of Royal Yeast for half an hour in a cup of luke-warm water with one teaspoon sugar. Then stir well and strain once or twice through muslin and drink the liquid. BETTER results will be obtained by allowing it to soak over night and drinking half an hour before breakfast. Repeat as often as desired. Send name and address for free booklet entitled "Royal Yeast for Better Health."

Beautiful Actress Attributes Her Wonderful Success to Her Famous Complexion

Tells How You Also May Have One

New York—When Miss Dorothy Dalton, the beautiful actress who was selected for the leading role in that mammoth New York production, "Aphrodite," was questioned as to the secret of her phenomenal success, she unhesitatingly said, "My complexion." When asked further details she explained: "Every one of my friends always raved about the texture and coloring of my skin, and I have no doubt but that my first engagement was made possible through the reputation I had acquired for a beautiful complexion. Managers are like ordinary mortals, they admire a beautiful skin as much as anyone, and in selecting their casts they naturally prefer those whose complexions are attractive. I think the best asset any girl or woman can have is a beautiful skin and complexion. It is easy to have this if one will spend only a little time in taking care of the skin. A girl may have irregular features, but if she possesses a beautiful complexion she will attract attention anywhere. I am always glad to tell any girl or woman just how she may possess a skin like mine. Here is the recipe: Night and morning cleanse the skin first with warm water, then apply a good cold cream (Liska cold cream I have found to be the best) after massaging it into the skin take off the superfluous cream with a soft cloth. Then before going out during the day or evening I apply Derwillo, a simple toilet preparation which can be purchased at the toilet counter of any up-to-date drug or department store. I find it excellent for my complexion as it protects my skin in all kinds of weather. That's why I prefer it to all other toilet preparations and am never without it. Now that short sleeves are in vogue you will want beautiful hands and arms. There is nothing like Derwillo for this purpose. Many of my professional friends to whom I have recommended Derwillo use it in preference to all other face powders or beautifiers." Just try it once before going to the theatre, dances, parties or an afternoon call and note the favorable comments of your friends. It takes the place of face powder and stays on until you wash it off. Perspiration does not affect it nor will it rub off on clothing; it also prevents the nose and face from shining. It's wonderful for a dark, sallow, rough skin, blackheads, coarse pores, oily skin, freckles, tan and for the instant beauty it imparts. Over 500,000 girls and women are using it. It's absolutely harmless to the most sensitive skin. Just try it once and you will need no further argument to convince you that there is nothing "just as good," "better," or "just like it." Insist on Derwillo, then you will not be disappointed.

NOTE—Druggists and department stores everywhere sell Derwillo with the guarantee that if you don't like it you get your money back. It is the one beautifier that gives satisfaction at all seasons of the year. You can secure it at all toilet counters everywhere.

Tambllyn Drug Stores, Toronto, will fill orders by mail.

The Official Guardian Act of Alberta

The Official Guardian had on hand on May 31st last, the sum of over $111,000.00, over $300,000.00 having passed through his hands from the time the Act came into force. Of this $111,000.00, the greater part is invested in Provincial Savings Certificates, $13,000.00 is in the new Provincial Gold Bond dition is acting as trustee in one hundred and fifty estates. In all, the files of the Department number twenty-five hundred and the monthly payments on account of infant beneficiaries average over $600.00.

In addition to the cash on hand for investment, the Official Guardian has

ASSETS OF ALBERTA

Bella, Jessie, Jamie and George have been kept together through the good offices of the "Act."

Loan; $13,000.00 in hospital debentures; a further amount in Victory Loan Bonds and another amount in school debentures, the accounts being audited at least monthly by the Provincial Auditor.

As yet the interest available for the amount on hand is not sufficient for payment of maintenance and other charges, consequently the greater part is invested in Provincial Savings Certificates, which can be realized on without delay.

The Official Guardian is acting as administrator (including soldiers' estates) in over two hundred estates and in ad-under his control, for infants or adult beneficiaries, real estate of the approximate value of $150,000.00, and so far as possible, where the assets are of sufficient value to warrant, payments necessary to conserve the estate by way of taxes or otherwise are paid out of the general funds, until such time as sale can be effected.

Administering Soldiers' Estates.

NO province in Canada has provided for the administering of soldiers' estates in the way Alberta has done through the Official Guardian Act. Over one hundred estates of soldiers, who have died leaving infant children, or who have been unmarried men leaving beneficiaries in Canada or in the Old Country have been administered by the Official Guardian. In the cases of estates of soldiers of a value under $5,000.00, not only have all the fees of the Surrogate Court office been remitted but the work of preparation of application done by the Alberta Returned Soldiers' Commission has been done without charge, the result being that the beneficiaries of the deceased soldier have received the full amount of the estate without any deduction whatsoever.

The office of the Official Guardian has also been taken advantage of by the Military Pension Board at Ottawa, and by the U. S. Pension authorities and pension to which children are entitled are paid direct to the Official Guardian and by him invested for the infants concerned.

A number of infants, the children of soldiers, are at present maintained at school or in suitable homes, and the pensions to which they are entitled paid out for their benefit, without any deduction.

In the case particularly of one soldier, who died leaving a widow who only survived him a few months, the Official Guardian was able to arrange so that the eldest daughter, a girl about eighteen years of age, was enabled to keep the family together in a small home and the results have been most satisfactory.

In another estate, in which a deceased soldier made a will, leaving all his property to his mother and brother, without in any way providing for his child, his idea having, doubtless been that the mother and brother would take care of the child after his death, it was found that the child's interests were not likely to be provided for and the Official Guardian was able to co-operate with the Great War Veterans' Association in compelling the mother and brother to enter into an agreement, by which the boy would be assigned a third interest in the estate.

In the case of another estate, where a transfer purporting to be executed by deceased had been registered to the prejudice of the infants as a result of the investigation of the Official Guardian, it was found that such transfer was a forgery, and without cost to the estate, property was restored to its original state, and will be disposed of under the direction of the department.

In other cases, especially of soldiers' estates, where there was an amount due the Dominion Government on pre-emption land, the amount required has been advanced and the land secured to the estate.

Many beneficiaries in England, especially mothers of deceased soldiers, have expressed their gratification, particularly to the Returned Soldiers' Commission for the prompt accomplishment of the work of the estates branch of the Alberta Returned Soldiers' Commission, which has done all the preliminary work in connection with the winding up of estates as well as of the application for administration; and also to the department of the Official Guardian for the prompt manner in which the estates have been wound up and the proceeds remitted.

Benefits of the Act.

THERE have been many benefits derived from this Act. Children of soldiers who have been killed overseas have been helped. Children of parents who have died and who have left no one to care for them, have been looked after and their estates have been managed with as little expense as possible.

The judges of the different courts have shown their appreciation of the establishment of this office and have made frequent use of it by directing that notices of proceedings before them, in which infants were affected should be served upon the Official Guardian; also that monies to which infants were entitled, be paid to the Official Guardian and dispensed by him for the benefit of the infants, as to his discretion might seem proper.

The members of the legal profession have not resented the fact that they have to some extent been deprived of fees but have shown an active interest in the work of the department and assisted greatly by advice and helpful suggestions.

In some cases administrators who did not feel competent to manage the affairs of the estate in which they were acting, have applied to the Official Guardian for advice and frequently transferred to him with the consent of the Court the monies in their hands, in order that same might be invested by him.

While the Official Guardian has no power to interfere, except on application to the Court, where the executors have been appointed by will, executors of estates in which infants are interested have in some cases applied to the Official Guardian for advice, either as to investment of funds at their disposal or otherwise, as to the management of the estate and where the will has been of a doubtful meaning and it has become necessary to apply to the court for its construction, the judges have caused the Official Guardian to be notified so that he might have an opportunity to be heard.

In several cases, where infants have attained nearly the age of twenty-one years, they have been awarded money by the courts, or under agreement by which their claims were fixed, and the amount so fixed has been paid to the Official Guardian. In one case in particular a young girl, seventeen years of age was in this way able to obtain a business education and enabled to maintain herself.

In Southern Alberta a man, who was a sheep rancher on a large scale, died and was followed soon afterwards by his wife. The estate was taken charge of by the Official Guardian, and the sheep and wool sold to advantage, showing a balance of about $25,000.00. Had the man been living to-day, owing to the mortality amongst his sheep during the last year, the drop in the price of wool, etc., he would have probably found himself in debt whereas his children are now being well cared for. This result is largely accidental—except that the Official Guardian gave the best advice possible.

In the case of one estate the Official Guardian is acting for five infants, the father and mother being alive, but unable to provide for the education of the children, two of whom are attending the University and one in the higher grades of the public school. The estate consists of some valuable farm property, unimproved, that cannot be sold conveniently at the present time. The Official Guardian makes a monthly advance out of his funds to the mother and father sufficient to allow the children to continue their education.

A Sparkling Serial

Most Canadians are familiar with the writings of that brilliant Irishman, known as G. A. Birmingham, who is a clergyman in private life and is really Canon Hannay of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and a writer on such serious matters as "The Wisdom of the Desert". As a novelist, he is one of the most sprightly and entertaining writers of fiction, and thousands of readers have laughed at his "Spanish Gold" and "General John Regan,"—not to mention "The Lost Tribes". The next serial in the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL will be "Sybil's Adventure", a story of endless and amusing complications when a young visitor to Ireland attempts to interfere with the Household of the Kerrigans.

Canadian Women's Institutes

members, selecting each lady to do the work which experience had proven she could do best. As a result, ladies came to the Women's Institute rooms and demonstrated their best and simplest cookery. Others with musical ability, taught physical games, and our girls delighted more than one audience with their folk-dancing. Another member, a trained nurse, taught the girls first aid work, and surely no one witnessing our April Display, ever saw more expert bandaging done, and surely never by children only eleven years old.

The outdoor part of the training fell into the capable hands of a Y.W.C.A. worker, spending this year at her home near here. And now I write the best part of my report for we have persuaded Miss McKay to take over our Girl Guide work. As she has varied her C.G.T. work with Social Settlement work in Minneapolis, and possesses a charming personality, our success for 1921 is assured. Miss McKay has chosen four young ladies to work with her, each with especial talent for at least one branch of the work.

Although the Girl Guides must not accept charity, they are not at all averse to the many conveniences and encouraging advantages made possible through their connection with the Emerson Women's Institute.

FROM SOUTH GRENVILLE.

THE South Grenville District has only four branches at present, but some good work has been done in the past year.

Maynard, the oldest branch, has 57 members, also a junior branch that meets with them and is a great help in preparing the programmes. They have used the printed programmes for two years and find them a great help.

They have accomplished a good work in improving their cemetery and keeping it cared for. Their greatest achievement this year has been the erecting of a beautiful monument to the memory of the twenty-one brave boys who left that neighborhood and made the supreme sacrifice in the late war. On the day it was unveiled the members were able to say it was all paid for and $100.00 of a balance in hand to beautify the plot. This meant raising $1,630 in less than five months.

They are now looking forward and planning for a Community Hall, which is badly needed along with their home work. They remembered the Sick Children's Hospital with a substantial donation. This shows what a great work can be accomplished when all work together.

Algonquin comes next in activity for the year. Their receipts for the year were $191.78, which was expended in helping the returned soldiers and various other expenses. They held a short course in Domestic Science and Home Nursing, which was very successful. Their great objective was placing a rest room in Brockville, which has been very successfully accomplished. Four rooms have been furnished, consisting of two sitting rooms, a kitchenette and lavatory. These are very nicely located and are heated and lighted. They have a matron in charge. They are financed by selling tickets to the different families who use them, and as a number of travellers are sent there by the railways, a small charge is made for the use of the rooms. The Algonquin Branch may well be proud of their year's work.

South Augusta has only been organized since March, but has thirty-four members and made the substantial donation of fifty dollars towards the rest room in Brockville. They are planning to improve their cemetery next year.

Spencerville has not been very active in the past year, but the members are planning to take up some work next winter. They donated $75.00 to the Armenian and other relief work, also kept up their usual home relief work and sent boxes of cooking and candy to the returned soldiers in hospital at Christmas.

Although our branches are few in number, there has been some good work done.

Manotick is a very active, energetic branch of 38 members covering six school sections. A committee was appointed in each school section to visit the home school and see in what way it could be improved and made more homelike for the children. One enthusiastic group held a social, clearing $63.40. A meeting was then called of committees, trustees and teachers. The teacher made the needs of the school known, the trustees added $100.00 to the amount raised by the women and ten new seats, a teacher's desk, a drinking fountain and a set of books were added to the school equipment.

Kars is one of our most flourishing branches. Officers are very energetic and show much initiative. The hot school lunch is being installed, and it is expected to have it in working order by the first of next month.

Leitrim, a new branch, might still be expected to be in the recipe stage but is reaching out after community interests and showing signs of vigorous growth. A library has been started; papers have been given and discussions held as to ways of improving the school, which will no doubt result in steps being taken in this direction.

Stittsville, another of our oldest branches and very progressive, put drinking fountains in four schools, where there had previously been only uncovered water pails.

VARIOUS REPORTS.

Carp, a very live branch, formed a Choral Club of 60 members, purchased a piano, and engaged a musical director from Ottawa to train them. The result was of great educational value, and from a social standpoint proved a boon to the young people of the community.

North Gower, our oldest branch, is increasing in interest and vigor with advancing years. A large amount of money was raised during the year, and the activities of the Institute are being extended. Interest in the Public Library has been on the wane in this village, and it was becoming difficult to finance it. The Institute considered it a very worthy cause and last year donated $105.00.

Bowesville is an enthusiastic little branch of 23 members, whose efforts are directed chiefly towards assisting the school. Eighteen prizes were given in a school garden competition.

Antrim holds the banner for number of meetings held and papers given during the year, the total being 14 meetings and 14 papers and addresses. Considerable originality is shown in the preparation of the programme.

In Glen Ogilvie, one of our youngest branches, books have been donated to the school library, and efforts are being made to have the girls take part in the work of the Institute.

Galeta is a progressive branch:—a concrete walk has been put in in the village and an electric light installed.

The Bad Penny

at Chong, and his supporters, and with fear that Ruffles' fate was now sealed.

It was Aunt Mary who spoke first. "Tom," she said impressively, "Ruffles must go. He is a rough, cowardly dog."

Unmanly tears sprang to Tom's eyes.

"He's not a coward, Aunt Mary," burst from him, resentfully. "He's—he's much better behaved than Chong."

Here everybody began to talk at once.

Eleanor said, "If Ruffles has really hurt him, I can never forgive him, Tom. George will be as upset as I am."

Judy, of course, had a great deal to say, and Aunt Mary expressed herself more fully. Father said little, and Tom somehow had a suspicion that he could look for a little sympathy in that quarter.

THE atmosphere was strained all evening. Chong, who was shaken, but unhurt, remained curled up in Eleanor's lap while she entertained George in some distant corner. Immediately after dinner Ruffles padded disconsolately up to Tom's room, and lay down with a sigh outside the door to wait for Tom to come up to bed. Tom joined him before long, and Ruffles went in with him and lay in his accustomed place on the rug beside the bed. Here, he received forgiveness from his master, and a great many things were uttered into his tousled ear, which if he could have understood them all, would have been unwise encouragement for future behaviour. At last, Tom turned off the light, and climbed into bed. He left the door ajar, for it was Spring again, almost summer, and the night was somewhat oppressive—the forerunner of hot summer nights. The light from the hall shone in obliquely upon the grey-brown form of Ruffles, lost in troubled sleep, close to him whom he loved best.

In the morning the family assembled at breakfast to find Tom glum and unhappy looking.

"Whatever is the matter?" inquired Aunt Mary.

"Ruffles has gone," mumbled Tom, miserably. "And it's all Chong's fault."

"That will do, Thomas," said Aunt Mary, reprovingly. "He will probably return before luncheon, and you will have had your sulks for nothing."

"But," Tom put in, "you said he was to go."

Just then Aunt Mary caught her brother's eye across the table.

"Well, well," said she, "I may have spoken a little hastily. But, of course, for Eleanor's sake, if it happens again he will have to go."

"I should think so," Judy said, staring accusingly at her brother.

"Aw, Judy, this isn't your fight," he exclaimed, exasperated. "Anyway, he's gone, and I don't suppose he'll ever be here to do it again, so you needn't worry, Eleanor."

He paid no attention to Chong, who was trying to attract his attention, with his feet on the edge of the chair, and Eleanor said soothingly,

"Never mind, Tommie, I'm truly sorry Ruffles has gone, but you'll see—he'll turn up again like a bad penny."

"He isn't a bad penny," snapped Tom, ungraciously. And the remark was so absurd that everybody laughed.

After breakfast, Tom walked part of the way to school with his father, and the sympathy Tom had already suspected was forthcoming.

"Tell you what," said the grown-up boy, "I'll help you hunt around for Ruffles. He can't be far away. And when we've found him we won't say anything to Aunt Mary, but you can take him back to that farmer out in Chester County, where I got him, and ask him to keep him for you till times are better at home."

The plan appealed to Tom, but the first question was to find Ruffles. Day followed day for a week, and Ruffles had not come home, neither had he been seen around town by any of The Family. As Tom's depression increased, the spirits of Chong rose since his ferocious enemy had been removed.

"I wonder," said Aunt Mary, one day, "why Ruffles went off so suddenly."

Tom looked at her hopelessly.

"Why, of course, because he heard you say you were going to send him."

"Nonsense," exclaimed Aunt Mary, with emphasis.

But it was not nonsense, for Ruffles knew better than to trust his own honor any longer where that little Chinese dog was concerned. So he had removed himself from temptation for the sake of his young master.

One evening Tom looked cheerful for the first time in many days. After dinner he immediately sought an interview with his father, at a distance from Aunt Mary.

"I've found him, father," he began joyfully. "A little girl a few blocks from here who knows him, put me on his track, and I found him this afternoon."

"Good," said the grown-up boy, rubbing his hands together in satisfaction. "Where is he now?"

Tom lowered his voice to a hoarse whisper.

"Don't tell," he begged. "Downstairs in the coal-bin."

His father laughed aloud. This was the signal for Aunt Mary to appear.

"Well," she said, "You two appear to be very merry. I'm glad if you have cheered up Tom."

Her brother patted her arm, and said,

"Go and make yourself comfortable for the evening, Mary, I am taking Tom out in the car on a little business, and it may take me some time to arrange it."

Aunt Mary wanted to wait and see them off, but they assured her vehemently that she was much too tired after her busy day to stand around like that, so she sat down with a book, and did not know that the car, when it left, contained a third passenger—a happy, four-footed one, with his shaggy coat harsh with coal-dust added to the dirt collected in a week's wandering. And when, having gone up early to bed, she heard the car return, she did not guess that it had travelled a number of miles, out into the country, and back again, with the third passenger left behind.

Very soon after the summer holidays began, and with them, a rising complaint from Aunt Mary.

"You must speak to Tom," she said to his father. "I counted on his being able to be useful in his summer vacation, gardening and so on. Instead of which, he's off on hikes all the time, as if every day were Saturday. He doesn't go with any other boys, and he hasn't even the excuse of that dog to take him, now."

Tom was spoken to quietly, when none of the womenfolk were around, and the suggestion was made that he should, in order to avoid suspicion, and also to be of some use at home, limit his all day visits to Ruffles on his

MOIR'S Chocolates

THERE is a restlessness which belongs to the spring-time that is as disturbing as it is exhilarating. Then it is that the woods and the hills begin to call to us and man turns his thoughts towards fishing and camping—while woman finds a strenuous joy in house-cleaning and having the living-room redecorated. The small boy finds school a daily burden and his sister suddenly develops an interest in "where we are going for the summer." There are all kinds of small adventures in these days for those who cannot think of a continent-wide journey and who have no prospect of sailing the Seven Seas.

It is rather curious to find that there is no word in the English language for the woman who has a gypsyish love for adventure and who enjoys the life of out-of-doors. True, there is the word, "adventuress," but that is not the feminine for "adventurer" and has a sordid significance which makes it of unpleasant association.

"There are no women who really enjoy the life of wandering and adventure," said a man in arrogant fashion. The speaker's opinion was not without weight for he is essentially of the wanderer tribe and is seldom in his old Canadian home for more than a month of the year.

"I don't agree with you," said his Cousin Mary. "There are women who have a real longing, every once in a while, to 'go-go-go' away from here."

"Oh, you know that Kipling poem?" said the Wanderer with an irritating air of condescension.

"I know Kipling very much better than you do," said Cousin Mary with a certain acidity. "The truth is, Frank, that you know very little about women. You think you do, because silly little debutantes in fluffy ruffles—scanty ones at that—say 'how fascinating,' when they hear that you have spent years in Japan and India—not to mention Egypt. Of course those girls would be horrified by real hardships and would take no sincere interest in other countries and their people. But even debutantes grow up and develop into responsible women."

"And it's no business of a responsible woman to travel about. She should stay home and look after the meals and the health of the kiddies. I tell you that the woman who really enjoys hunting big game or camping out, except in a very amateurish way, is not to be found."

"In all your adventurous life," asked Cousin Mary, "have you not met with one woman who enjoyed travel out of the beaten path—adventure for its own sake—and who was quite willing to put up with roughing it?"

"Well—perhaps there was one—she was English by birth and had been all over the world and seemed to enjoy every mile of the journey. She and her husband were living in British Columbia, which they thought the best corner of the Earth. He and I left for the war together and she ran the ranch while he was away. But I don't know how much her fondness for the life was a reflection of her husband's adventurous spirit. There isn't a woman who has the temperament of a Selous or a Roosevelt."

"How about the pioneer women on this continent?" asked Cousin Mary.

"They came as wives or would-be wives," said the Wanderer complacently. "Capturing and holding a man is really woman's Great Adventure."

"You're—you're simply idiotic," said Cousin Mary. "There's no adventure in that. It's only deadly dull domesticity. You must have been reading that horrid George Bernard Shaw's 'Man and Superman.'"

"I haven't been reading—I've been observing," said the Wanderer placidly. "It's just as well for the world, of course, that woman should prefer a home with Persian rugs and the latest thing in vacuum cleaners to wandering about the world, climbing mountains, or exploring caves. What I object to is a woman who pretends to like a life of tramping and roughing it, when you know all the time that she would hate anything but the modern conveniences and bridge parties and all the rest of it."

"There is more of the pioneer spirit, even in our city-dwellers than you think," persisted the obstinate Cousin Mary. "Man has not, by any means, a monopoly of the adventurous spirit. Look at the women in the summer-time! They are swimming, running launches and helping to put up the tent or take the canoe over the portage. You know perfectly well that we enjoy that life for its own wild sake. Perhaps we don't care for shooting deer—but that is because we are naturally more humane than men are."

"But you have no objection to eating the ducks we kill or wearing the feathers of slaughtered birds," returned the Wanderer.

"Really, it sounds as if you two were quarrelling," said the voice of an elderly matron who is Aunt Alice to the Wanderer and to his would-be-wandering cousin. "What is it all about?"

"Frank says that there are no women who love adventure or travel for its own sake—that a woman's only pursuit is that of a husband."

"All men say that," was the unruffled reply of Aunt Alice. "Personally, I don't care for adventure. I like to read about it; but, as for life itself, I should prefer it to be as smooth and untroubled as a mill-pond. I'd like to live in the same house all my life, know the same people and be buried in a country churchyard. Strangers disturb me very much;—and why Frank wants to go to the ends of the Earth for nothing but a few curios and some trophies, I can't understand."

"There wouldn't be any white Canadians if our forefathers hadn't decided to leave home," said Frank decidedly. "It's the rolling stone that has built the British Empire."

"Perhaps it has," admitted Aunt Alice; "but rolling stones are uncomfortable things. I like a quiet life and a settled one."

"That's the proper sentiment for a woman," said her nephew approvingly. "Woman is a domestic animal and should remain near the fireside—or the latest thing in a kitchen range."

"And who is going to provide the kitchen range, if woman is not to go outside the house, and man is to spend his time wandering in the remote places of the Earth? If woman is to lead a life of unvaried domesticity, man will have to remain in civilized centres and provide the food and the furniture."

"That is just what the poor men do, if they are caught young. I'd rather have an uncertain habitation and escape the electric light bills and all the rest."

"You are not truly patriotic, Frank," said Aunt Alice, with gentle disapproval. "It's curious how a man will fight for his country and then spend most of his time leaving it. I suppose that, like the rest of these wanderers, you'll settle down some day in a village, marry a nice girl and pay taxes forever after."

Giving the Child a Chance

That I was speaking the truth, outwardly calm, inwardly resentful of his implication. At the conclusion of still another test, during which he looked bewildered, he apologized for doubting my word, saying he knew now I had spoken the truth. He entered into a long, technical explanation, which I did not understand, but I gathered that mine was an unusual case. Certain muscles of the eyes had become atrophied from improper focusing. He was going to prescribe glasses to be worn constantly, and they would have to be changed frequently as they were to educate my eyes. He said, whimsically, that he was going to send my eyes to school, and that it would be impossible for me to use glasses which would give me normal sight as they would be too heavy for me to wear.

This was several years ago, and my eyes are still going to school. I suppose only the blind can understand my desire to see things by feeling them. I still want to look through the tips of my fingers!

If I had worn glasses when they were first prescribed for me I would not only have been saved much discomfort and worry, but I would not have faced life with a handicap, which is not the only one I work under, for want of proper attention when I was young.

The carrying-out of the advice given as a result of medical inspection in schools cannot be too strongly advocated. There can rarely be full spiritual, moral, and mental development unless these things are established on a sound physical basis, and there are few children, no matter what their handicaps at birth may be, who cannot be helped to sound physical health.

This neglect of children's welfare is not confined to the poor who cannot afford the things essential to the proper physical equipment of their children. It is found in all ranks of life. The poor are usually quick to take advantage of any free treatment provided.

Sometimes parents are reluctant to have a child's physical shortcomings corrected, such as the removal of adenoids or tonsils, because of the temporary suffering a child must endure. If they will analyze their feelings they will very often find that it is their own suffering, through the child's, which is the real cause of their reluctance. If doctors and nurses acted on this principle the sufferings of the world would be intensified beyond calculation.

He finally gained the top of the rise; and let himself down in the grass, distant some thirty feet from them. A flash of lightning—or even the lighting of a lantern would have revealed him clearly.

"It's his life or mine," in Mabyn's blustering whine were the first words he distinctly heard.

"He could kill you to-day, and he let you go," Rina quietly returned.

"That's a lie!" blustered Mabyn. "How do you know?" he added inconsequentially.

"He tak' your knife from you. I saw it in his belt," said Rina. "And he let you go."

"He say to me he not 'urt you, if you keep away from there," Rina went on.

"Keep away!" Mabyn fumed. "This is my place! I'll go where I choose on it! He's trespassing on my land!"

I've a right to drive him off! I've a right to kill him if he doesn't go!"

"He will hear you!" said Rina warningly.

"Let him hear me!" said the man—nevertheless he lowered his voice. "They're a quarter-mile off," he added.

"Listen!" said Rina.

Over the lake, from an immeasurable distance, came throbbing the imbecile laughter of a loon.

"Loon, him three miles off," said Rina significantly.

Thereafter, Mabyn spoke in a whisper; a wheedling note crept into his voice. "That was a good scheme of yours, going to the camp to set the girl's arm," he said. "Now we can find out all they do!"

"I not go to find out," said Rina sadly. "I go for I sorry I 'urt her. I shoot her jus' lak a breed I am!"

Mabyn paid no attention to this. "Keep your eyes open when you're in their camp every day," he urged. "See how much food they have; find out where he keeps the shells for his gun. If you could only steal the gun!"

"He carry it always on his back," said Rina. "He never put it down."

"I know, he's on his guard now," said Mabyn. "But if you act friendly all the time, he'll forget. We've got plenty of time; do nothing for a few days. I'll keep away from there, too. He'll think it's all right. Then"—Mabyn's whisper was pure venom—"sneak up behind him and knock him on the head with an axe! Choose a moment when the girl is asleep or delirious. We will throw his body in the lake. No one will ever know how it happened!"

There was a pause.

"Will you do it?" said Mabyn eagerly.

Rina remained silent.

Mabyn cursed her under his breath. "I believe this smooth-faced young whelp has cast an eye on you too," he snarled. "You're false to me!"

A low cry was forced from Rina's lips; she made a rapid move; and Garth understood that she had thrown herself at the man's feet. "'Erbe't, you know you don't speak true," she whispered painfully. "You my 'os-ban! All men I hate, but you!"

"Then do what I tell you," snarled Mabyn.

"'Erbe't!" she pleaded rapidly and urgently. "Let them go! What have they got to do with us? To-morrow I go to him. I tell him how to mak' her well. The man will give me a horse and things. An' you and I will ride to the Rice River people. They are my people. They will give me a gun. We will be so ver' happy, and not think of this man and this woman any more!"

"You can go, and be damned to you!" said Mabyn sullenly. "I stay on my own place!"

Garth understood then, that she drew very close to the man, lavish in the expression of her sad love and timid caresses, in a desperate effort to move him. He could not hear it all; but his cheeks burned to be the intruder on such an exposure of a woman's soul—a white soul, he thought, whatever the color of her skin.

Mabyn was utterly insensible to it all. In the end he became impatient, and flung her away from him with an oath. She fell to the ground with a soft thud; and for a while there was no other sound, but the dreadful, low catch of her breath, as she sought to strangle her sobs.

"'Erbe't, if you no love me I die," she breathed.

"Did me of this man, and I'll love you fast enough!" said Mabyn eagerly. His breath came thick and stertorous. "Ah! Let me once grind my heel in the smooth, sneering face of him! and you shall do what you like with me!" Rage robbed him of speech; he made mere brutish sounds in his throat.

By and by he managed to control himself; and his voice resumed its crafty, wheedling tone. "Only do what I tell you, my Rina, and you shall know what it is to be loved by a white man. I shall have no thought all day, but for you! Up to now you have done all the loving; I will repay it twice over! You shall be loved as no red woman was ever loved before!"

"'Erbe't! 'Erbe't! Don't mak' me do it!" she whispered terror-stricken.

Garth could stand no more. Springing to his feet, he strode forward, grasping the barrel of his rifle to use it for a club. Shooting was too merciful for such a creature.

"You damned scoundrel!" he cried.

Mabyn fell back against the wall with a gasping cry of fright. Quick as Garth was, Rina was quicker. Before he could reach the man, she scrambled over the ground, and clutched him by the knees.

"Let him be!" she screamed. "I kill you!"

Garth struggled vainly to free himself. Finally bending over and seizing her shoulders, he thrust her away. But the blow he again aimed at Mabyn never descended; for with incredible swiftness Rina gained her feet, and darted down hill.

"I kill her!" she shrieked.

A sickening fear gripped Garth's heart, instantly obliterating all thought of Mabyn. He dashed after Rina, nerved to a desperate fleetness. She knew the ground better than he; and hampered, moreover, by the weight of his gun, he despaired of overtaking the moccasined savage. But at the watercourse the strange creature stopped dead; and waited for him to come up.

"Go back to your white woman!" she cried stormily. "If you 'urt him, I pull her bandages off, and beat her arm till she die of pain!"

CHAPTER XVIII

MABYN MAROONED.

WHEN Natalie awoke, it was a gray and haggard Garth she saw through the raised flaps of her tent. His arms, folded on his knees, bore up his chin; and he stared before him, still pursuing the narrow round of his troublous thoughts. He was the gainer for his excursion, by valuable information—but he was no nearer the solution of it all.

Natalie partly raised herself on her good arm. "My poor Garth!" she said softly. "How very tired you are!"

His weary eyes lighted up. "I'm all right," he cried. "And how are you?" "Splendid!" she said, matching his tone—while her face was drawn with pain. "Come in," she added softly.

He sat a little diffidently on the ground beside her; Natalie's room—though its walls were of canvas, was a sacred place to him when she was in it. "Look at me!" she commanded.

He turned his grave, smiling eyes down on her. In spite of difficulties, dangers and weariness, he had to smile when he looked at her; he loved her so! His eyes were full of it.

Natalie's eyes fell; her hand crept into his. "You may tell me to-day," she whispered.

He understood. "Oh, my Natalie!" he murmured deeply. "I love you! It breaks my heart to see you suffer!"

The question of plain or figured over-draperies is a most important one to decide and should be determined mainly by the type of paper used in decorating the walls. Where a plain paper has been used, figured draperies are permissible and prevent a monotony of coloring. On the other hand, highly decorative wall-paper calls for plainness of hangings. I know of nothing more disturbing to one's peace of mind than a repetition of pattern in both draperies and wall-paper, and I have seen examples of this that left me a small opinion of the artistic sensitiveness of those who had chosen the decorations and proposed to live surrounded by them.

We have said nothing so far of one of the most excellent plain materials that the ingenuity of the modern manufacturer of textiles has provided for overhangings, and that is the material known as "sun-fast." As one may judge by its name, it will not fade in the sun but retains indefinitely its coloring. It is to be obtained in many delicate colors and shades and is of a semi-transparency that gives a most desirable glow of color to the room.

It is interesting to note the effects that are obtainable from various treatments of a window. For instance, if we wish to make the ceiling of a room appear higher the curtains should be hung from the very top of the trim and should fall the full length to the floor. On the other hand, an over-high ceiling may be largely corrected by hanging the window curtains low on the trim and the full width of it, having them fall only to the bottom of the sill. A deep valance or lambrequin will also assist the desired effect. As a matter of fact, in all informal rooms such as the living-rooms or bed-rooms, the short curtain is more attractive, whereas in drawing or dining-rooms more dignity is given by curtains which are hung the full length and just escape the floor.

Casement windows allow of several interesting treatments and may be made a delightful and picturesque feature of the room. Either double or single sash curtains may be used, and these give no trouble when the window is opened. In addition the window may be draped with side curtains and a shirred or box-pleated valance used. The side curtains, while hung on the outside of the trim, should be wide enough to come together when the shades of evening fall and the lamps are lighted and the room is aglow with light from within. The valance should be hung on a separate pole so that it may not interfere with the drawing of the side draperies.

Speaking of the valance reminds us of its importance in the scheme of farm, to, say two days a week. Tom was unhappy, but accepted the decision as a wise one.

Late in July, he approached his father on the subject.

"I just hate it," he said, "Ruffles is happy enough out there, I suppose, because they're good to him. But he goes wild when he sees me, and they have to chain him up when I leave so he won't follow me. And they have to hang on to him most of the time so he won't go away. I'd hate them to lose him."

You May Suffer

If you leave that film on teeth

The cause of most tooth troubles is a viscous film. You can feel it now. You can see it, perhaps, in cloudy teeth.

It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. The tooth brush used in old ways does not remove it all. So most people have suffered from some film attack, and tooth troubles have been constantly increasing.

How film attacks

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus film—which dentists call bacterial plaque—is now known as the teeth's great enemy.

Now we combat it

Dental science, after diligent research, has found effective film combatants. Many clinical tests have been made by authorities. Now leading dentists everywhere are urging their adoption.

The methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. Pepsin is also included. To millions of people in Europe and America it has brought a new era in teeth-cleaning.

This ten-day test will tell

A ten-day test is being sent to anyone who asks. Get it and see what it means to you.

Pepsodent attacks film in two effective ways. Then it leaves so high a polish that film-coats cannot easily adhere.

It also meets other requirements. It multiplies the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits which otherwise cling and may form acid. It mul-tiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

Each use of Pepsodent brings all these effects which highest authorities seek.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears. What you see and feel will convince you. Cut out the coupon now.

She caught up his hand, and pressed it to her cheek. "I am cured!" she whispered with a lift in her voice.

"There is something I want you to do for me," she said presently.

"Anything in the world!" he cried.

"No!" she said. "This is only a little thing — but you mustn't laugh!"

He immediately smiled.

"I want to feel, for a moment, that I have helped you too," she whispered. "Put your head down on my good shoulder."

He flung himself down beside her, and laid his head where she bid. Her breath was warm on his cheek. He slipped his over-heavy-burden, and glided into Paradise for awhile.

"My brave, brave Garth," she whispered in his ear. "All my heart is yours! I thought about this last night — every time I woke. I thought we might steal one such moment. I thought, what if something happened to you, or to me, and we had never known it!"

She tried to tempt him to sleep a while, but Garth, fearful of tiring her, and with his responsibilities pressing on him, drew himself away. He arose, better refreshed, he vowed, than by all the nights of sleep he had ever had in his life.

As he rose, their lips met, once and briefly.

Garth's first task after breakfast was to clear the growth of willows that obstructed their access to the lake. The little island was framed squarely in the centre of the opening made by his axe; and off to the left, across an estuary formed at the mouth of the water-course, Maby's shack stood on top of its cut-bank in plain view.

At sight of the convenient island, Garth was struck by an idea. He examined it attentively. It lay something less than a quarter of a mile off shore; and a triangle might have been drawn between his camp, the island and Maby's shack, of which the three sides would have been at about equal length. The island was about three acres in extent; and completely ringed about with willow bushes. In the centre, two or three cottonwood trees elevated their heads above the willows.

Later, he asked Natalie casually: "Could Maby swim, when you knew him, do you remember?"

"He could not," she said instantly. "In fact he had a childish horror of the water."

Garth turned his head to hide his satisfaction; and his plan began to take shape.

While the sun was yet low, Rina, true to her promise came to attend upon Natalie. There was no change in her manner; her unreadable eyes expressed no consciousness of the events of the night before. She questioned Natalie in her best professional way. It was not yet necessary to disturb the dressings on the arm; but she volunteered to do Natalie's hair; and what other offices would contribute to her comfort. Garth, convinced now that he had as sure a hold on her as she on him, unhesitatingly allowed her to enter the tent alone. But he kept within ear-shot.

He necessarily overheard part of their talk. Natalie, it seemed, had a method of her own with Rina. Obliterating the fact that she had received her injury at the breed's hands, she was unaffectedly grateful for all that was done for her; and what was more subtle — or kinder — she treated Rina as her equal, as one who understood in herself the thoughts and the instincts of a lady. Garth, with the clue he possessed to the unhappy heart of the girl, could not tell which he ought to commend the more, Natalie's mother-wit, or her generosity.

Rina apparently sought to steel her breast against the other's overtures. For the most part she maintained a hardy silence; and when she did speak, it was in sullen monosyllables.

Issuing out of the tent, she surprised Garth by asking, as one who demands a right, to take old Cy. She needed an herb for Natalie, she said, that could only be procured on the shore of a slough five miles away. Garth was prompt with his permission. There was a possibility that it was merely a pretext to deprive them of the horse; but his heart leaped at the chance of getting Rina out of the way for an hour. It was all he needed to complete his plan; and it had seemed an insuperable bar. If she turned the horse out, he would come back anyway; for Cy was the town-bred horse, always waiting anxiously about camp for his vanished stable; and Garth had further trained him to stick to the outfit, with judicious presents of salt and tobacco.

Rina, disdaining a saddle, scrambled on his back, and rode off. Garth waited, not without anxiety, to see what direction she would take. She presently reappeared, mounting the rise of the shack. Pausing briefly at the door, apparently to speak within, she continued her way up the slope behind; and, gaining the prairie, disappeared over the brow.

GARTH instantly put himself in motion. He had his compunctions in thus moving against Rina while she was absent on an errand for Natalie; but he consoled himself with the thought that Rina, with all she could do, had still a heavy score to pay off. He told Natalie what he was about to do; and at her earnest pleading carried her out of the tent, and propped her partly upright at the edge of the lake where she would be able to see him. Then, looking to his gun, he set off a second time for the shack.

From the circumstance of Rina's pausing at the door, he was well assured that Mabyn was within. He had marked that the door stood open. On his way, he paused to examine the ancient dugout lying at the mouth of the watercourse; and found it in a sufficiently seaworthy condition to answer his purpose. A paddle lay in the bottom.

Garth ascended the grassy slope swiftly and noiselessly; and making a detour around the window, presented himself suddenly at the door. Mabyn was revealed to him sprawling on his blankets in the corner, plucking at his face, and scowling at the rafters, he, too, no doubt, plotting and scheming. When the armed shadow fell across the floor of his shack, he started to his elbow; his eyes widened, his flesh blanched and a visible trembling seized his limbs.

"What do you want?" he contrived to stammer.

Strong disgust seized Garth again; so dispicable an adversary shamed his own manhood. He shifted his gun significantly.

"Get up!" he said.

Mabyn dragged himself to his hands and knees. It was some moments before he could control himself sufficiently to stand upright.

"What are you going to do with me?" he kept muttering.

Garth stepped backward. "Come outside!" he commanded.

Mabyn obeyed, making a circuit of the walls for support.

"Face about!" ordered Garth; "and walk to the mouth of the creek!"

Mabyn became even paler. His skin was like white paper on which ashes have been rubbed, leaving streaks and patches of gray. "Would you shoot me in the back?" he said shrilly. "An unarmed man! I will not turn my back!"

"Then walk backward!" said Garth, with his laconic start of laughter.

Mabyn went like a crab down the rise, with his head over his shoulder, a ludicrous and deplorable figure. He was unable to drag his eyes from the gun, consequently he stumbled and lurched over every obstacle. Once he fell flat; and a sharp scream of fright was forced from him. Garth sickened at the sight, while he laughed. He had to give him a minute in which to recover himself.

Mabyn, scarcely coherent, ceaselessly begged for mercy. "Do not kill me!" he whimpered. "I can't die! Oh, God! Not like this! I never had a chance! You kill Natalie if you kill me—the breed will fix her!—and my mother! You'll have three murders on your soul! I can't die yet!"

"Get up!" commanded Garth.

Reaching the edge of the water, he ordered him into the dugout.

Mabyn fell on his knees on the stones. "Not in the water! Not in the water!" he shrieked. "Kill me here!"

"No one is going to kill you," said Garth with scornful patience.

Mabyn darted a furtive look of hope and suspicion in Garth's face. He got up.

"What are you going to do with me?" he muttered.

"Put you on the island," said Garth coolly.

"I'll starve," he whined.

"Food will be brought you regularly, as long as you obey orders," said Garth.

Mabyn, his extreme terror subsiding, showed an inclination to temporize. "Let me get a few things," he begged. His eyes wandered to the hill over which Rina had disappeared.

Garth was anxious on the same score. He fingered the trigger of his gun. "In with you!" he said.

Mabyn jumped to obey.

Garth, sitting in the bow with his weapon in his arms, faced Mabyn; and forced him to wield the paddle. Mabyn, seeing that he did mean to put him on the island, realized there had been no occasion for his brutish terror; but instead of feeling any shame for the self-betrayal, he characteristically added it to his score against Garth.

Garth, wary of the furtive gleam in the man's eye, sprang to his feet the instant they touched the island, and leaped out, careful not to turn his back. He forced Mabyn to retire a dozen paces, while he took the place he vacated in the stern; and then he ordered him to push off.

At the prospect of being left alone, Mabyn's flesh failed him again. He clung to the bow of the canoe, and gabbled anew for mercy. Garth, wearying of it all, suddenly sent a shot over his head. His weapon, silent and smokeless, had an effect of horrible deadliness. Mabyn, with a moan of fear, pushed the canoe off, and sank back on the grass of the islet.

Exchanging his gun for the paddle, Garth hastened back to the mouth of the creek, pausing only to wave his hat reassuringly at Natalie, whom he could see reclining on her grassy couch. An essential part of his plan was yet to be effected; and he knew not how soon Rina might return. Hastily ransacking the cabin, he gathered together all their meagre rations; flour, sugar, beans, tea and pork; and he likewise commandeered everything that might be turned to use for a weapon, an axe, a chisel, and all knives. Three trips up and down the hill conveyed it to the dugout. Re-embarking, he had no sooner brought it all to his own camp than Natalie's sharp eyes discovered Rina returning on the distant hill.

The Happy Happening
otherwise, a bundle of help hints

IT'S not alone the flowers, the sunshine and the cheer—chirpings of the robin that make Spring such a joy—giving season for you and me. It's quite as much that wondrous something that sets us planning with enthusiasm and makes the things that seemed tasks last Fall, mere incidents this Spring. Suddenly, one morning, you realize that the house looks shabby and needs a new coat of paint. That night, looking through this magazine you read this ad, and discover that we publish a book called "The Happy Happening," filled with help hints on painting and varnishing. ## Two On the Trail

Garth carried Natalie into the tent again; and nerved himself to await the inevitable scene. Meanwhile he could see Rina alight at the door, search the cabin hastily, and dart about outside, like a distracted ant returning to find her dwelling rifled. She followed the tracks down to the water's edge, dragging the horse after her. Seeking over the water, she soon discovered the dug-out lying at Garth's camp; whereupon she clambered on the horse again. Presently she came crashing through the bush.

This was a vastly different kind of antagonist, that slipped from the horse and faced him with blazing eyes. Rina regarded the weapon in his hands with as little respect as if it had been a pop-gun. But there was nothing baffling about her now, she was just the furious woman common to any shade of skin.

"Where is he?" she cried—and without waiting for any answer, emptied the hissing ewer of her wrath over Garth's head. Her careful English was drowned in a flood of guttural Cree—she fished it up only to curse him.

Garth received the impact in silence, for at first she was in no condition to take in the answers she demanded. He suddenly realized, as a man thinks of an interesting circumstance that does not concern him at all, how beautiful she was and the thought gave him greater patience.

Rina, bethinking herself at last that her Cree was wasted on him, went back to English. "You wait!" she cried threateningly. "Bam-bye, her bone, him grow together, and she all the time cry of pain! Then you want me bad, and I not come! She will have fever and die!" She passionately threw down the leaves she had brought and ground them under her heel.

"Mabyn is unhurt!" Garth repeated patiently more than once. "I put him on the island."

At last it seemed to reach her. "What for you do that?" she demanded.

"He is always trying to kill me," he said. "I have only put him where he can do no harm!"

"I tak' him off!" she cried defiantly. "I mak' a raft! You can't stop me!"

"I have seized all the food," said Garth quietly. "You will get none for him unless he stays where he is."

Rina's anger stilled and concentrated. "You devil!" she hissed.

Garth turned away. "When you are yourself," he said coolly, "I will talk to you plainly and honestly about us all."

"I not talk with you!" she stormed. "You tell lies to me! I not come again—till some time you sleep—then I come and kill you!"

He faced her with a sudden imperiousness she could not ignore. "Then the way is made open for Mabyn to come to her!" he cried. "Where will you be then?—thrown on the ground, as you were yesterday!"

The shot told. Her arms dropped, she visibly paled. The white man's blood in Rina's cheeks betrayed her at the moments when most she desired to secrete her heart. She lowered her head to hide her stricken eyes from him. Suddenly she turned and fled through the trees.

Garth was beginning to believe that Rina after all was not so different from her white sisters; if so, he thought she would come back. Natalie, who had overheard all that passed, said so too. Garth wished to carry Natalie out of the tent, that she might help him work with the girl; but Natalie, with better wisdom, said no, that Rina would be more tractable if she were out of sight.

Meanwhile he set to work with an air of unconcern he was far from feeling

—there were a hundred ways this plan of his might miscarry, and only one way it could succeed! He tied old Cy to his stake again; and carefully gathered up what remained of the herbs Rina had cast on the ground. He unloaded the seized supplies and made a temporary cache under a piece of sail-cloth.

By and by, while he was so engaged, he became aware that Rina was hovering about among the trees. He went on with his task, carefully avoiding any notice of her. She approached by devious stages, like a child drawn against its will. When it became impossible longer to conceal herself, she came into the open with her old, wistful, sullen, inscrutable face.

"What you want say to me?" she asked at last, feigning supreme indifference.

"Sit down," he said.

She dropped obediently on the grass; and averted her head. She did not squat like the other red people but reclined, supporting herself on one hand, much as Natalie might have done.

Garth lit his pipe, considering what simple, figurative form of words would best appeal to her understanding.

"I do not wish Mabyn harm," he began mildly. "He is nothing to me. My heart knows only one wish—to make her well, and to take her back safely to her friends outside. To accomplish that, I will let nothing stop me!"

He paused to let it sink in. Rina gave no sign of having even heard.

"That is your wish, too," he continued. "You want her away from here. She and I are nothing to you. You were happy before we came!"

"Mabyn is mad because she will not have him!" Garth went on. "He is always crazy for what he cannot have."

She turned her head again with the look that said so plainly, "How did you know that?"

"When we get her away, he will soon forget. All will be as it was before!"

"Do I not speak true words?" Garth challenged.

She evaded the question. "If you go out, you send the police after him," she muttered.

He saw Mabyn's hand here. "I will not," he said quickly. "I give you my word on that!"

"There's my hand on it," said Garth, offering it.

Rina gravely laid her own in it, and let him wag it up and down. This form of binding an agreement she knew.

Still she had not committed herself to anything and Garth paused, determined to make her speak before he went on.

She favored him at last with a walled glance purely savage. "Let 'Erbe't go off the island," she said indifferently. Clearly she asked it more with the idea to see what he would say, than with any hope of his agreeing.

"I will not do that," said Garth firmly. "Night and day he would be plotting to kill me. Night and day he would be driving you on to do it for him. You would try to do it. You cannot say no to him! And if you did bring me down—" (Garth sunk his voice—"all, all would be lost!—Mabyn and you and Natalie and I!")

Her eyes sought his with a poignant glance and she paled again. He felt he had made an impression.

"I will treat him kindly," he said, seeking to follow up his advantage. "You shall go to the shack now for everything that he needs and we will take it to him."

"Can I spik with him?" asked Rina in a low tone.

Garth rejoiced—it was the first token of submission. "For five minutes by my watch," he said.

Charm that has a Single Source

IN beauty which serenely stands the scrutiny of repeated glances, artifice plays small part.

A clear, radiant, youthful complexion, the brightness of the eyes and the sheen and lustre of the hair have but a single source—internal cleanliness. Internal cleanliness is the originator of charm, the handmaid to beauty, the basis of personal attractiveness.

Nature uses the blood as a means of feeding the skin. Each one of the millions of skin cells lies as it were on the bank of a tiny blood-stream, whose function it is to bring nourishment to the cells.

If the organs of elimination do not function properly, poisons are formed, absorbed by the blood; and these tiny streams bring contamination, not nourishment, to the skin cells. Do you not see the danger? It is these poisons that are the most common cause of unattractiveness. Facial blemishes, muddy skin and sallowness are all traceable to them.

Nujol has been found by many women to be an invaluable aid to a clear, radiant complexion. It encourages the bowels to regular and thorough evacuations, thus keeping the body free of those poisons that mar the skin and endanger health.

Nujol relieves constipation without any unpleasant or weakening effects. It does not upset the stomach, cause nausea or griping, nor interfere with the day's work or play.

WORKS ON A NEW PRINCIPLE

Instead of forcing or irritating the system, Nujol simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles, in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system.

Nujol thus prevents constipation because it helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world, and the single source of beauty, attractiveness and personal charm.

Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. Try it.

Considering the Curtain and Such Stuff As It Is Made Of

furnishing the window. Hung as it is between the two side curtains, it becomes the connecting border which completes the frame to the picture seen beyond. Without it the side draperies become simply two straight and unattractive lines of color and are monotonous where there are more windows than one. The valance may be made in several different ways. Where more luxurious materials, such as velvets, are used, the fitted or shaped valance is more correct, and this may be plain or edged with a metal galloon to add a note of richness. When a lighter material is employed the valance may be box-pleated, shirred or made with a French heading. If box-pleated, the pleats should be as wide as the intervening space. As for trimming both valance and curtain, many pretty and effective edgings of cotton, silk and gilt are to be found in the shops and these often add very materially to the character of the draperies.

So much for the town house. We come to the curtaining of the windows of the country house with just a little different point of view—a feeling that here we may relax some of the formality and give way to our natural desire for gaiety of color and boldness of design. Daring patterns, blending most amazing colors, do not seem incongruous amid the natural colors of the country, and gaily hung windows are but in harmony with the general landscape that surrounds the country home. Washable materials are most desirable, for these may be carefully laundered and as carefully folded away in readiness for use in the coming season. Freshness is the note required in curtaining the country home. White dotted muslins for the upper rooms, linens and cretonnes below—and color as it appeals to us.

Since without using color plates, it is impossible to reproduce plain materials with any degree of success, we have been obliged to confine our illustrations to materials showing design, and have chosen several which are representative of the better patterns at present in vogue. The art of ornamenting woven fabrics or textiles is of very ancient origin and is said to have been practised in China and India from time immemorial. In China, at any rate, from which country there has emanated so many priceless forms of decoration, the art was known long centuries before any kind of printing had come into existence in Europe, and therefore engraved wood-blocks had to be used for the purpose. History tells us that India was the source of Europe's knowledge of the art of block-printing and that the practice spread by land westward through Persia, Asia Minor and the Levant, and was taken up in Europe in the Seventeenth Century. At the same time France became familiar with the process and brought the knowledge back by sea from her colonies on the East Coast of India, together with samples of fabrics printed in "India" blue and various "resist" colors.

England was late in discovering the art and it was not until 1676 that a French refugee opened small textile printing works on the banks of the Thames, near Richmond. Even then, the new industry did not flourish and it was not until nearly ninety years later that a real establishment was founded by Messrs. Clayton, of Bamber Bridge, near Preston, and the foundation was thus laid for what has become one of the most important industries in the world.

What Will Tomorrow Bring?

Would you go with full powers and beauties into the coming years? Then, cherish well the powers and the beauties which are yours today. Guard jealously that portal of your body, the mouth. Beware of Pyorrhea.

In its effect upon the body, Pyorrhea is akin to age. It depletes vitality, and weakens organs whose perfect functioning is essential to health. In its blight upon beauty, Pyorrhea is as merciless as Time.

Watch your gums. Pyorrhea begins with tenderness and bleeding of the gums. Then the gums recede, the teeth decay and loosen, or must be extracted to rid the system of the Pyorrhea germs which breed in little pockets about them. It is to these infecting germs which seep into the system through the gums that medical science has traced so many serious ills.

End your Pyorrhea troubles before they begin. Visit your dentist regularly for tooth and gum inspection, and start using Forhan's For the Gums today.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean.

How to Use Forhan's

Use it twice daily, year in and year out. Wet your brush in cold water, place a half-inch of the refreshing, healing paste on it, then brush your teeth up and down. Use a rolling motion to clean the crevices. Brush the grinding and back surfaces of the teeth. Massage your gums with your Forhan-coated brush—gently at first until the gums harden, then more vigorously. If the gums are very tender, massage with the finger, instead of the brush. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions, and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

35c and 60c tubes in Canada and the United States. If your druggist cannot supply you, send price to us direct and we will mail tube postpaid. At all druggists.

CHAPTER XIX GRYLLS REDIVIVUS.

ON the next day but one Natalie's condition took a sharp turn for the worse and for many days thereafter, Garth put every other thought out of his head. She fell into a high fever and suffered incessantly and cruelly. At this call, Rina showed forth in colors wholly admirable; day or night she seldom left her patient's side she was never at a loss what to do and Garth comforted himself with the thought that Natalie could scarcely have had better care anywhere.

During these busy days Rina appeared to forget her own heartache in a measure and never once on the occasion of their daily trip to the island (Garth forcing her to accompany him) did she again express a wish to speak to Mabyn. At their approach Mabyn always retreated and they were accustomed to set his rations down on the shore and immediately go back.

But Garth could not trust the breed unreservedly, and unceasing vigilance was his portion. He had little enough sleep before, and now he strove to do without it altogether. For three days and three nights he did not close his eyes. On the fourth day, warned by his tortured, wavering brain that it must be either sleep or madness, he took his fate in his hands and lay down on top of the cache, with his gun beside him.

He was unconscious for nearly twelve hours. When he awoke it was to find Rina's eyes fixed upon him strangely. He sprang up, and she turned away her head. He could not read that expression—still he had lain there at her mercy and she had spared him. Neither had she liberated Mabyn from the island, and Garth could see him moving about. He began to hope that his arguments had real weight with the breed and little by little, under pressure of his great need, he began to trust her.

But when the dread promontory was weathered at last, and Natalie, a wraith of her blooming self, awoke in her right senses, Rina changed again, resuming her old sullen, moody self; and all his work was undone. It was clear the unfortunate girl was dragged ceaselessly back and forth between her new-fledged soul and the old savage impulses of her blood. She learned to love the irresistible Natalie whom she had snatched back from death—but she likewise hated her; hated her blindly because Mabyn loved her and inconsistently, but naturally, too, hated her because she despised Mabyn. The same with Garth; over and over she unconsciously showed she trusted him; but her blood still rebelled because he was Mabyn's enemy; and he would sometimes find her eyes fixed on him in a quickly veiled expression of savage, implacable hatred.

On the first day of his imprisonment, Garth, under threat of withholding supplies, had forced Mabyn to cut down the willows fringing the hither side of the island; and his movements about his fire and tepee were in plain view of those on shore. Concealed from him by a tree, Rina would often sit by the hour, watching him wistfully. "God knows what course her harried brain pursues!" Garth, observing her, thought—"If she thinks at all!" One thing was sure: under the strain of continued separation, her resistance to Mabyn's evil suggestions was gradually breaking down.

It was their second red-letter day, when the last sod was dropped into place on the roof, and Garth carried Natalie inside. Strictly considered, the house was not very much to brag about; perhaps; for it slanted this way and that like the first pothooks in a child's copybook; but Garth, fired by Natalie's enthusiastic praises, could not have been prouder if he had completed the Taj Mahal.

One end had been partitioned off for Natalie's room; and in finishing this part Garth had spent all his pains. The floor was made of small logs, filled and plastered with clay, which he had hardened by building fires upon it; and had then strewn rushes over the whole. There was a rough bunk in one corner, with a low table by its side—the latest thing in rustics, the maker explained. There was a tiny window high up on the side overlooking the lake; it had no glass, but a stout shutter swinging on wooden pins, and which fastened with a strong wooden bar. But the crowning feature of the room, constructed with infinite pains after countless failures, was the fireplace in the corner. Garth deprecated it; it wasn't much of a fireplace; only a sort of little arched doorway of baked clay, so narrow the logs had to stand upright in it, making cooking very difficult—but when Natalie saw the flames curling up the chimney in the most natural way possible, she set up a feeble crow of delight.

The balance of the interior was to serve for Garth's room and storeroom combined. It had a very small door, also on the lake side but he could not afford a window beside; and he also saved himself the trouble of flooring it. The door was constructed in the same manner as the shutter, of matched poles strongly braced behind, and further strengthened with rawhide lashings.

Natalie had Garth hang a spare blanket over the doorway between the two rooms; and she produced a shawl to serve for a table cloth. After supper, when they locked themselves in and heaped up the fire, Natalie propped up on her couch, and Garth sitting on a stool, smoking by especial request—it was as snug as Heaven, Natalie said. The nights had been growing dreadfully keen of late; and poor Natalie wrapped in all the blankets they possessed had nevertheless more than once lain awake with the cold. But now, within thick walls—what matter if they were out of the perpendicular?—and under a tight roof, with the flames leaping briskly up the chimney, no king in his palace ever experienced such a sense of opulent and all-sufficing luxury as Garth and Natalie the first night in their miserable shack.

This was the fourteenth day after Natalie's accident. Every day after the first week had shown a slight improvement in her condition; and every day had therefore lessened the hold Rina had over them; until now Garth felt, should it be necessary, he could bring the patient safely back to health unaided. Rina knew this too; and became daily more morose and sullen in her demeanor. To separate her longer from Mabyn would be, Garth felt, simply to promote an explosion. Besides, sufficiently housed now, well armed, and with the food safely stored, he felt strong enough to be merciful. On the night they moved into the shack he pointed out the canoe to Rina, telling her that henceforth she was free to use it as she would. He would go to the island no more, he added; but Rina might come every day for rations for both—as long as Mabyn remained where he was.

He hoped by this to incite the energetic Rina into planning Mabyn's escape from the island. They could catch a couple of horses and ride to their friends at the distant Settlement, or where they would. He felt he could trust

The Bad Penny

"He'd find his way to you," consoled his father. "Just wait."

So Tom waited, and in August Aunt Mary decided to take her nieces and nephew off to the sea for a month; her brother could not leave his work to go with them. Tom loved the sea but he loved Ruffles better, so he elected to stay home with his father. A discussion followed, in which Tom had to explain to his Aunt that the reason he wished to stay behind was that his father would be lonely all by himself.

"Fiddlesticks!" said Aunt Mary, "It's never bothered you before."

But when the head of The Family said, "Let him stay, Mary, if he wants to," the subject was closed, and they departed without him. Chong, to the relief of the two stay-at-homes, went too, and—his place was without delay filled by Ruffles, who immediately showed his joy at being home and at the absence of Aunt Mary, by skating all over the house on the rugs, and barking gleefully in the big voice which was such a contrast to Chong's. The cook, who was bound to secrecy by her employer, welcomed Ruffles with open arms. So, throughout August, as far as Tom and his dog were concerned, Aunt Mary, and the three sisters were on the list of things that never will be missed.

WITH the arrival of September, the old order returned. Ruffles was hurried back to the farm just before the arrival of Aunt Mary and the girls, sunburned and enthusiastic, from the seashore. Chong had survived also, without falling into the sea or any fatal mishap. They were hardly home when Eleanor and George announced their intention of being married in October.

Aunt Mary became visibly agitated. "Good gracious!" she sighed, "what a scramble to get everything ready at such short notice. It turns me faint to think of it."

But the insistence of the prospective bride and groom carried the day, and The Family bestirred itself accordingly. Housecleaning, cook's holiday, everything had to be postponed till after the important event. Aunt Mary was too rushed and preoccupied to care that now that school had opened again, Tom still disappeared every Saturday in the same mysterious way. As for Ruffles, he never entered her head; and Chong seemed to have developed the distressing habit of getting in her way continually during these hurried days, and she lost her temper on his account more than once.

One day, not long before the wedding, Eleanor said, "I've half a mind to leave Chong for you after I'm married, Aunt Mary. He seems to love you better than he does me. He's grown most attached to you."

"Indeed he has," agreed that harassed lady remembering the time she had narrowly avoided stepping on him in her hurried going to and fro. "But my dear, he is your dog, and it wouldn't be fair to George,—since Chong was his gift to you, for you not to take him with you."

Tom, who was present at the moment, agreed with his aunt most heartily.

Finally, after a last few days of upheaval and strain, the like of which Tom could not remember, the wedding-day dawned, clear, golden and crisp, a glorious October day. Aunt Mary was observed to look quite weepy on several occasions during the morning; and Eleanor's father looked anything but joyful when she was not present, for she and George were going off to a very distant city to make their start in life, and it was a wrench.

Thus it came about that Chong was to depart with them, as he was to share in the new home. He had been washed and brushed till his yellow hair was like softest silk, and Judy had attached a huge white bow to his minute collar.

Let us touch lightly on the wedding itself, though the bride could have borne looking upon a long time; the throng of friends, the reception at the house, the great white cake, the speeches and laughter and tears, the catching of the bride's bouquet by the elated Judy, and Chong, who in his excitement caused Aunt Mary to spill some champagne down the skirt of her brand new dress. Let us hasten to the last moments before the departure of the bride and groom, when Tom, feeling quite sad, having just been upstairs to kiss his sister good-bye, was waiting out on the sidewalk, clutching a handful of confetti and wondering why brothers had to go to weddings anyway.

The sound of laughter and shuffling feet arose from the house, and Eleanor had appeared at the far end of the awning, hurrying laughing through a shower of confetti, when Tom's eye caught sight, through a knot of curious spectators on the sidewalk, of a familiar figure trotting up the street in his direction. He peered in front of him, to make sure, and then with a joyful whoop of "Ruffles!" uttered the peculiar whistle which his dog knew.

There followed a tapping of claws on the side-walk, and Ruffles burst through the little crowd, and leapt joyfully upon his master, just as Eleanor reached the motor, where her husband and Chong had already arrived. Ruffles was unkempt, and from his collar dangled a piece of rope, giving evidence of having been chewed through. He had fulfilled what Tom's father had said of him, and had trusted his instinct to show him the road to his master.

Eleanor stopped suddenly, in spite of her hurry to be off, and giving her brother one last impulsive kiss, she patted Ruffles' disreputable head, and cried,

"I told you he'd turn up like a bad penny."

"Oh, Jack,
I'm so glad you thought of it!"

Stiff, Glossy Bristles-- The Secret of Service

When you select a hair brush, military brushes or a clothes brush, examine the bristles carefully.

Are they a gleaming white? High-grade bristles are stiff, pure white and glossy. Do not buy a brush with dull white bristles.

In every Keystone Brush the highest grade of long, stiff, shining bristles are so arranged in uneven lengths as to provide perfect penetration.

ONLY TABLETS MARKED "BAYER" ARE ASPIRIN

Not Aspirin at All without the "Bayer Cross"

The name "Bayer" on Aspirin is like Sterling on silver. It positively identifies the only genuine Aspirin—the Aspirin prescribed by physicians for over nineteen years and now made in Canada.

Always buy an unbroken package

There is only one Aspirin—"Bayer"—You must say "Bayer"

Aspirin is the trade mark (registered in Canada) of Bayer Manufacture of Monocetate of Salicylic acid. While it is well known that Aspirin means Bayer manufacture, to assist the public against imitations, the Tablets of Bayer Company will be stamped with their general trade mark, the "Bayer Cross" of "Bayer Tablets of Aspirin" which contains proper directions for Colds, Headache, Toothache, Earache, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Rheumatism, Neuritis, Joint Pains, and Pain generally. Tin boxes of 12 tablets cost but a few cents. Larger "Bayer" packages.

Two On the Trail

Rina. If she ever got Mabyn among her own people, to keep him from coming back. Thus he would at the same stroke be rid of them, and conserve his rapidly diminishing stores. It was no great matter if they drove off all the horses, for he still had old Cy under his eye for Natalie to ride; and their own journey back would have to be undertaken at a walking pace, anyway. He had learned enough of Rina's mixed character to be sure that this would have a greater chance of coming about if he let her think of it for herself, so he said nothing to her.

He was disappointed. Mabyn, too timid to undertake so long a journey without ample supplies, or perhaps too obstinate to go, they remained on the island; and Rina came every day for food. If she was grateful for being allowed to join Mabyn she did not show it. Every trace of her better nature rapidly disappeared, and she seemed wholly the sullen savage. Bad treatment was the explanation they thought; and they pitied her.

GARTH waited five days more. Natalie was by that time moving around freely; and they had begun to count the days to their ardently desired retreat from that unhappy valley. The question of food became more and more pressing—their journey would have to be spread over many slow stages; and he finally decided to drive Mabyn and Rina away.

So the next time Rina came, he told her he would give her two days' rations for two persons the following day; and after that they need expect no more. In the meantime, he said, she was free to go up on the prairie and catch the first two horses she met. He even offered her old Cy to round them up, secure in holding the dugout for a hostage. Rina betrayed not the least surprise, or any other feeling at his ultimatum, but coolly rode off as he bid her. She returned within an hour driving Emmy and Timmoosis, which she picketed below Mabyn's hut.

What passed between Rina and Mabyn when she returned to the island, the other two could only guess at. However, Garth, up at dawn next morning, saw them striking the tepee. They made two trips back and forth between the island and the mouth of the creek; and afterward, while Mabyn saddled and packed the horses, Rina paddled to Garth's camp to get the promised rations. They both awaited her on the bank.

Rina presented the mask-like face they had grown accustomed to, and maintained a dogged silence. The only sign of feeling she gave was a shadow-like pain drowned deep in her dark eyes. Natalie's own eyes filled at the sight of her stubbornness; in the days of her suffering she had grown very fond of her dark-skinned nurse; and it was she who had insisted throughout on the existence of Rina's better nature, and had never given up hope of reclaiming the worser part. And now it seemed, she must admit herself defeated.

Garth laid out the food he had allotted them; and packed it in a flour-bag convenient to carry. He also gave Rina an open letter he had written, setting forth their situation (without implicating Mabyn or Rina) and asking that food and an escort be sent. That it would ever fall into responsible hands was problematical; but it was a chance. He refrained from any suggestion that it should be concealed from Mabyn, but Rina of her own accord thrust it in her dress; and he argued well from the act.

Rina turned to go without a word; but Natalie called her softly. In her hand she was holding a round silver locket, in which she had put a tiny picture of herself. She held it out to Rina with a wistful smile.

"For you," she murmured. "Keep it because I love you."

Rina looked at the little picture, struggling to maintain her parade of unconcern. But suddenly she snatched it out of Natalie's hand; and thrust it in her own bosom. Her face worked with the pain of those who weep with difficulty; her eyes filled and overflowed at last. With a wild, brusque abandon, she flung herself at Natalie's feet and pressed the hem of her dress to her trembling lips.

"You good! You good!" she sobbed. Then springing to her feet as abruptly as she had fallen, she flew away among the trees.

Half an hour later they heard the two horses passing the trail behind their camp; the same trail by which they had all first entered the valley; and the way to Spirit River Crossing.

At first they dared not believe they could really be free of their enemy so easily; and they continually found themselves listening for the sound of their return. Garth saddled Cy at last; and rode along the trail to the top of the bench. He saw Mabyn and Rina two specks in the distance; and still travelling south. When he returned with the news to Natalie, they allowed themselves to rejoice at last; and they were filled with a great peace.

"I can understand now why men are so crazy to be explorers and things," said Natalie. "They go away just for the tremendous fun of coming back to it all! Oh-h! Think of dances—and even despised tea-parties now! Think of theatres and restaurants and going to the races!"

"And wouldn't I like to take you straight through to New York, though!" sang Garth. "Oh! Broadway and the Avenue in September! Everything getting under way again! And Coney Island is still going! Picture Luna Park dropped down on the island out there!"

They laughed at the incongruous picture.

"Where would we dine the first night?" asked Natalie.

"Martin's," said Garth. "Fancy us in the balcony looking down on the giddy crowd; and the orchestra sawing off the sextet from 'Lucia' for dear life!"

"Lobster à la Newburg and a pêche Melba!" cried Natalie in an ecstasy.

"Not on your life!" said Garth. "Just like a girl's bill-of-fare. Something sensible for yours when you go out with me! How about a filet dernier cri?"

"Don't know it," said Natalie. "Besides, I refuse to be sensible in my imagination," she added.

Garth described the delicacy. "And a cheese sauce on top all browned, with strips of red pepper laid criss-cross; and it comes steaming hot under a little glass cover!"

Natalie groaned. "Oh, talk about something else!" she said faintly.

"What will you wear?" asked Garth with a grin.

Natalie drew a long breath and plunged forthwith into elaborate, excited descriptions.

From the deep folds and softly cushioned surfaces of even the finest upholstery, all lint and dust may speedily be suctioned away by the air attachments of The Hoover. But for the vastly more difficult task of cleaning rugs, so as to prolong their life, The Hoover brings into play all three of its forces. Gently it beats out all nap-cutting, embedded grit. Briskly it sweeps up all clinging litter, erects matted nap and freshens colors. Vigorously it cleans by air. Only The Hoover discharges all these duties. And it is the largest-selling electric cleaner in the world.
